You are too well acquainted with the causes which produced this result to require any explanation of them. As it appeared that Great Britain would not revoke her Orders in Council on the just grounds on which it was claimed, but enlarged the conditions on which she professed her willingness to revoke them, there remained no honorable course for the United States to pursue short of war. On full consideration of all circumstances this measure was adopted, and the Government is resolved to pursue it till its objects are accomplished with the utmost decision and activity in its Power.

In resorting to war against Great Britain, as the United States have done, by inevitable necessity, it is their desire and hope that it may be confined to her only.

It is seen with much regret that the Emperor of Russia is likely to be reduced to the necessity of becoming a party to the war in Europe, if he has not already become so. Should that event take place, there is no reason why the war between the United States and Great Britain should affect, in the slightest degree, the very friendly relations which now exist between the United States and Russia. It is the sincere desire of this Government to preserve, in their utmost extent, those relations with that Power.

With France our affairs in many important circumstances are still unsettled; nor is there any certainty that a satisfactory settlement of them will be obtained. Should it, however, be the case, it is not probable that it will produce any closer connexion between the United States and that Power. It is not anticipated that any event whatever will have that effect.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State.

ST. PETERSBURG, Sept. 30, 1813.

On the 20th instant I received a note from the Chancellor requesting me to call upon him the next evening, which I accordingly did; he told me that he had asked to see me by the Emperor's command; that, having made peace and established the relations of amity and commerce with Great Britain, the Emperor was much concerned and disappointed to find the whole benefit which he expected his subjects would derive commercially from that event defeated and lost by the new war which had arisen between the United States and England; that he had thought he perceived various indications that there was on both sides a reluctance at engaging in and prosecuting this war, and it had occurred to the Emperor that perhaps an amicable arrangement of the differences between the parties might be accommodated more easily and speedily by indirect than by a direct negotiation; that His Majesty had directed him to see me, and to inquire if I was aware of any difficulty or obstacle on the part of the Gov-

ment of the United States, if he should offer his mediation for the purpose of effecting a pacification. I answered that it was obviously impossible for me to speak on this subject any otherwise than from the general knowledge which I had of the sentiments of my Government; that I was so far from knowing what their ideas were with regard to the continuance of the war, that I had not to that day received any official communication of its declaration; but that I well knew it was with reluctance they had engaged in the war; that I was very sure, whatever determination they might form upon the proposal of the Emperor's mediation, they would receive and consider it as a new evidence of His Majesty's regard and friendship for the United States, and that I was not aware of any obstacle or difficulty which could occasion them to decline accepting it.

I knew the war would affect unfavorably the interest of Russia. I knew it must be highly injurious both to the United States and England. I could see no good result as likely to arise from it to any one. The Count replied that he had considered it altogether in the same light, and so had the Emperor, who was sincerely concerned at it, and who had himself conceived this idea of authorizing his mediation. He thought an indirect negotiation conducted here, aided by the conciliatory wishes of a friend to both parties, might smooth down difficulties which, in direct discussion between the principals, might be found insuperable. To a mutual friend each party might exhibit all its claims, and all its complaints, without danger of exciting irritations or raising impediments. The part of Russia would only be to hear both sides, and to use her best endeavors to conciliate them. I observed, that there was a third party to be consulted as to the proposal—the British Government. The Count answered, that it had already been suggested by him to the British Ambassador, Lord Cathcart, who had the day before despatched it by a messenger to his Court. Some question occurred concerning the mode of enabling me to transmit this communication to the United States, upon which the Count promised to see me again in the course of a few days. He said that he should write to Mr. Daschkoff, and instruct him to make the proposition to the Government of the United States.

Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State.

ST. PETERSBURG, Oct. 17, 1812.

SIR: I received a few days since a letter from Mr. Russell, dated at London, the 9th of September, and informing me that his mission there had closed, that he had received his passports, and that in three days from that time he should leave the city to embark at Plymouth for the United States. He adds that the British Government had rejected a proposition which he had been authorized to make for a suspension of hostilities.

The evening before last I had another interview with the Chancellor, Count Romanzoff, at his request. There had been rumors in circulation here of an armistice in Canada, and of the appointment of Commissioners by the President for a new negotiation with Great Britain. The Count asked me if I had any authentic information of these circumstances. I said I had not; that my information was altogether of a different aspect; and I told him the substance of Mr. Russell's communication. He then observed that this incident would not discourage this Government from making an offer of its mediation, which he had suggested to me in a former conference. On the contrary, the failure of every new attempt at direct negotiation confirmed him in the belief and hope that a mediation might be more successful; a mediation of a common friend, not only desirous from the sentiment of friendship to see the parties reconciled to each other, but having also a strong interest of his own in their reconciliation.

The Count said he had his despatches for Mr. Daschkoff ready, instructing him to make the proposition in form to the American Government; and he asked me whether I could indicate to him a mode of transmitting them directly to the United States. In our former conversation (reported in my letter of the 30th ultimo) I had offered to despatch one of the American vessels now at Cronstadt, if the British Ambassador would furnish her a passport, or any document that would protect her from capture by British armed vessels. The Count said he had made the proposal to the Ambassador, who had expressed his readiness to give the document, provided the vessel and messenger should go by the way of England; a condition which the Count said he had told the Ambassador he could not ask me to agree to, and with which I did not think it, in fact, suitable to comply. There are, however, two American gentlemen here on the point of departure for the United States, and by them I shall transmit this despatch and its duplicate, together with those of the Chancellor, to Mr. Daschkoff.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

ST. PETERSBURG, Dec. 11, 1812.

SIR: On the 4th instant I received the duplicate of your favor of 1st July last, announcing the declaration by the Congress of the United States of war against Great Britain, and enclosing printed copies of the President's Proclamation founded upon it, of his previous Message recommending it, of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations proposing it, and of the National Intelligencer of the 20th June. The original of your letter, with these documents, not having yet come to hand, these gave me the first official communication of the war.

I had, on the 7th instant, an interview with the Chancellor, Count Romanzoff, in which I communicated to him the substance of that part of your despatch which related to Russia, and those which concern the state of our relations with France. In the present state of the war between this country and France, I was convinced that the view of the American Government's intentions with regard to that Power, so explicitly and so strongly manifested in your letter, would not only be gratifying to the Chancellor, but that it would be satisfactory to the Emperor, and would powerfully counteract any impressions unfavorable to the United States, which the English interest here is endeavoring to excite. I therefore told the Count, that, although I had not been instructed to make to him any official communication of the declaration of war, the dispositions of the American Government towards other Powers, and particularly towards Russia, on this occasion, had been distinctly suggested to me, in a manner which I felt it my duty to make known to him; that the United States, compelled by unavoidable necessity to vindicate their violated rights against Great Britain by war, were desirous that it might be confined exclusively to them and their enemy, and that no other Power might be involved in it; that it was particularly and earnestly their wish to preserve and maintain, in their fullest extent, their commercial and friendly relations with Russia; that the war in which the Emperor is now engaged against France, although it could not be known by the President to have been actually commenced at the time when your despatch was written, was, however, contemplated as more than probable, and the necessity which obliged the Emperor to take a part in it was mentioned to me as a cause of regret to the American Government; but it was hoped it would not, in the slightest degree, affect the friendly dispositions between Russia and the United States; that I was informed by you that the principal subjects of discussion which had long been subsisting between us and France remained unsettled; that there was no immediate prospect that there would be a satisfactory settlement of them; but that, whatever the event in this respect might be, it was not the intention of the Government of the United States to enter into any more intimate connexions with France. This disposition, I added, was expressed in terms as strong and clear as I thought language could afford. It was even observed that the Government of the United States did not anticipate any event whatever that could produce that effect; and I was the more happy to find myself authorized by my Government to avow this intention, as different representations of their views had been widely circulated as well in Europe as in America.

The Count received this communication with assurances of his own high satisfaction at its purport, and of his persuasion that it would prove equally satisfactory to the Emperor, before whom he should lay it without delay. He said that, with regard to the friendly and commercial relations with the United States, it was the Emperor's fixed determination to maintain them, so far as depended upon him, in their fullest extent. He asked me if I had any objection to his communicating to the British Government itself that part of my information to him which related to France. I said that, on the contrary, as the British Government had, in the course of our discussions with them, frequently intimated the belief that the American Government was partial to France, and even actuated by French influence, I supposed that the knowledge of this frank and explicit statement, with a due consideration of the time and occasion upon which it was made, must have a tendency to remove the prejudice of the British Cabinet, and, I would hope, produce on their part a disposition more inclining to conciliation.

Yesterday the Count sent a note requesting me to call upon him again, which I accordingly did. He showed me the draught of a despatch to the Count Lieven, the Russian Ambassador in England, which he had prepared to lay before the Emperor for his approbation, and which related the substance of my conversation with him, particularly in regard to the intentions of the American Government with reference to France; instructing Count Lieven to make it known to Lord Castlereagh, and to use it for the purpose of convincing the British Government of the error in suspecting that of the United States of any subserviency to France, in the expectation that it would promote in the British Ministry the disposition to peace with the United States, which he (Count Lieven) knew His Imperial Majesty had much at heart, believing it equally for the interest of both Powers, and also for that of his own empire. The Chancellor said that, as this despatch would refer to what I had verbally stated to him in our preceding conversation, he wished, before submitting it to the Emperor, that I should peruse it to satisfy himself that he had connectedly represented the purport of my communication to him; and he desired me, if I should find any inaccuracy or variation from what I had said to him, to point it out to him; that he might make the despatch perfectly correspond with what I had said. I did, accordingly, notice several particulars in which the exact purport of what I had said might be expressed with more precision. He immediately struck out the passages which I noticed in this manner from the draught, and altered them to an exact conformity with the ideas I had intended to convey. The changes were inconsiderable, and were no otherwise material than as I was desirous of the utmost accuracy in the relation of what I had said, under the authority of your despatch.

This communication of the settled determination of the American Government not to contract any more intimate engagements with France, will thus be made to the British Ministry with my full consent. The Chancellor's despatch does not say that he was authorized by me to make it. It merely relates the substance of that part of my conversation with him, and directs Count Lieven to use it with a view to promote the purpose of pacification. The Chancellor understands that my consent was merely my own act, without authority from you; my motive in giving it was the same with that of his instruction to Count Lieven, because I believed its tendency would be to promote the spirit of pacification in the British Cabinet. I told the Chancellor I was aware that its effect might be different. That the very certainty that we should not seek or even accept a community of cause with their most dreaded enemy might make them more indifferent to a peace with us. But in calculating the operation of a generous purpose even upon the mind of an inveterate enemy, I feel an irresistible impulse to the conclusion that it will be generous like itself. I asked the Chancellor whether he had received an answer from England upon the proposal of the Emperor's mediation. He said that, without accepting or rejecting it, they had intimated the belief that it would not be acceptable in America.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 26, 1813.

On the 15th instant I had an interview with the Chancellor, Count Romanzoff, at his request, when he informed me that he had received answers from Mr. Daschkoff to the despatches of which Mr. Harris was the bearer; that the President had accepted the Emperor's office of mediation; and that Mr. Daschkoff had sent him a copy of your answer to him, expressive of that acceptance. He then put into my hands your letter to Mr. Daschkoff of March 11, with the tenor of which he appeared to be much gratified; and which he said he should immediately transmit to the Emperor. At the same time English newspapers had been received here mentioning the appointment of Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard, but intimating strongly the determination of the British Government to reject the mediation. A few days after, I received from a friend the National Intelligencer of the 15th April, containing an editorial paragraph concerning the appointment of those gentlemen, which I communicated to the Count on the 22d. I observed to him, that however the British Government might think proper to act on this occasion, that of the United States would at least have manifested in a signal manner at once its earnest and constant desire for a just and honorable peace, and its sense of the motives which had induced the Emperor's offer. That the President could not have adopted a measure better adapted to do honor to His Majesty's proposal, than by the appointment of two persons among the most distinguished of our citizens, to co-operate, on the part of the United States, in accomplishing the Emperor's friendly and benevolent purpose; and that if it should eventually fail of being successful, at least the true and only source of its failure would be known; that he had received, since he saw me last, despatches from Count Lieven; that the British Minister, in terms of much politeness, had intimated to him, that there was no Sovereign whose mediation they should more readily accept than that of the Emperor, but that their differences with the United States were of a nature involving principles of the internal government of the British nation, and which it was thought were not susceptible of being committed to the discussion of any mediation. The Count added, that it would remain to be considered whether, after this, and after the solemn step taken by the Government of the United States, it would be advisable to renew the offer to the British Ministry, and give them an opportunity for a reconsideration. It was possible that further reflection might lead to a different resolution, and he should submit the question to the Emperor's determination. Different circumstances furnished other materials for deliberations.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State complying with their resolution of the 11th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 18, 1814.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 18, 1814.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, requesting the President to communicate to the House any information in his possession, and which it may not be improper to divulge, in relation to the omission or refusal of the French Government to accredit the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to that Court, or of his reception if accredited, of the time when he was so accredited, and of the progress of his negotiation, has the honor to communicate to the President, for the information of the House, the following letters in relation to that subject, namely:

A letter from Mr. Crawford to the Secretary of State, of the 15th August, 1813, enclosing one to the Duke of Bassano, of the 27th July, and his answer of the 1st August; and an extract of a letter from Mr. Crawford to the Secretary of State of the 8th of September, 1813.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Crawford to Mr. Monroe.

PARIS, August 15, 1813.

SIR: On the twenty-seventh ultimo I wrote to the Duke of Bassano, to inform him of my arrival in Paris, in quality of Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States. On the 8th instant I received an answer dated at Dresden, on the 1st. Copies of my note and of his answer are herewith enclosed.

With sentiments of high respect, I remain, yours, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

HON. JAMES MONROE,
Secretary of State.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

[Enclosed in Mr. Crawford's letter of Aug. 15, 1813.]
Mr. Crawford to the Duke of Bassano.

PARIS, July 27, 1813.

MY LORD: I have the honor to inform your Excellency that I have been appointed by the President of the United States of America Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of his Imperial and Royal Majesty, the Emperor of the French and King of Italy. I wait the pleasure of your Excellency as to the time and manner of presenting my official credentials, preparatory to my reception by the Government of His Imperial and Royal Majesty as the accredited Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

I seize on the present occasion to assure your Excellency of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

DRESDEN, August 1, 1813.

SIR: I have had great pleasure in hearing of your safe arrival in France, and I have received the letter which you did me the honor to address me on the 27th of July, on your nomination in quality of Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French and King of Italy. The choice which your Government has made of a person so distinguished in his own country, and so worthy of this, honorable mission, cannot but be agreeable to His Imperial Majesty; and though he is at this time absent from Dresden, I can give you this assurance in his name. I will have the honor to communicate to you his intentions respecting the presentation of your letters of credence and your reception. Without waiting even for this, I will receive all the communications which you may think proper to make to me as the Minister Plenipotentiary of your Government, and the delay of a formality will produce no delay in the exercise of the mission confided to you, or in the correspondence which it will procure for me the benefit of holding with you.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my consideration.

THE DUKE OF BASSANO.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Crawford to Mr. Monroe.

PARIS, September 8, 1813.

I have just received an answer to the note which I addressed to the Duke of Bassano, requesting Mrs. Barlow's passports. On the subject of recognition, he says that he is very solicitous I should present my letter of credence to the Emperor in Paris. He does not repeat his invitation to communicate with him. The operations of the war will probably detain the Emperor in the North until the Winter. It is believed that the Duke of Bassano will not return before him. If this opinion should be realized, the Winter will be far advanced before I shall be able to draw the attention of the French Government to the subjects of discussion between the two nations.

GREAT BRITAIN—NATURALIZATION.

[Communicated to the Senate, April 16, 1814.]
To the Senate of the United States.

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolutions of the 2d February and 9th of March.*

JAMES MADISON.

APRIL 16, 1814.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 14, 1814.

The Secretary of State, to whom were referred several resolutions of the 2d July and 9th March last, has the honor to submit to the President the following report:

Although these resolutions are of different dates, and refer to subjects in some respects distinct in

*The resolutions are as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a statement of the names of the individuals selected from American prisoners of war and sent to Great Britain for trial, as mentioned in his Message at the commencement of the present session of Congress; and also their respective places of residence in the United States, with the times when, and the courts where, they were admitted to become citizens of the United States, and the regiments or corps to which they belonged in the service of the United States when taken by the enemy, and the times and places of their being so taken; together with copies of any official correspondence respecting the treatment of prisoners of war, and any orders for retaliation on either side, which the President may judge proper to be communicated.

FEBRUARY 2, 1814.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, calculated to show what has been the practice of Great Britain concerning her native subjects naturalized in other countries and taken in arms against her; also, what is the general practice of the nations of Europe relative to the naturalization or employment in war between two nations of the native subjects of each other.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, of the cases, with their circumstances, in which any civilized nation has punished its native subjects taken in arms against her, and for which punishment retaliation has been inflicted by the nation in whose service they were taken.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, calculated to show under what circumstances, and on what grounds, Great Britain has been in the practice of refusing to discharge native citizens of the United States impressed into her service.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, calculated to show what has been the conduct of Great Britain relative to American seamen on board her ships of war at and since the commencement of the war with the United States.

MARCH 9, 1814.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

their nature, yet, as they are connected in others of considerable importance, which bear essentially on the conduct of both parties in the present war, it is thought proper to comprise them in the same report.

The first of these resolutions calls for the names of the individuals who were selected from the American prisoners of war, and sent to Great Britain for trial; their places of residence in the United States; the times when, and the courts by which, they were admitted to become citizens; the regiments to which they belong; when and where they were taken; with copies of any official correspondence respecting the treatment of prisoners of war, and of any orders for retaliation on either side.

The other resolutions request information of the conduct of Great Britain towards her native subjects taken in arms against her, and of the general practice of the nations of Europe relative to naturalization, and the employment in war, each, of the subjects of the other; of the cases, with their circumstances, in which any civilized nation has punished its native subjects taken in arms against it, for which punishment retaliation was inflicted by the nation in whose service they were taken; and, lastly,

Under what circumstances, and on what grounds, Great Britain has refused to discharge native citizens of the United States impressed into her service; and what has been her conduct towards American seamen on board her ships of war at and since the commencement of the present war with the United States.

The paper marked A contains the names of the American prisoners who were sent to England for trial by the British commander in Canada; of the corps to which they belong; of the times when, and of the places where, they were taken; of their places of residence in the United States; of the times and the courts in which they were admitted to become citizens, there is no evidence in this department; nor is there any to show whether they were naturalized or native citizens of the United States. This paper contains, also, a copy of the orders of both Governments for retaliation, and of the correspondence between their respective commissaries concerning the treatment of prisoners.

The paper marked B states various grounds on which the British Government has refused to deliver up American seamen impressed into the British service, on the application of the agents of the United States, regularly authorized to demand them, with the correspondence relating to the same. It communicates, also, such information as this department has been able to obtain of the conduct of the British Government towards American seamen on board British ships of war, at and since the commencement of the present war. Among the causes assigned for their detention, the following are most deserving of notice:

1. That they had no documents, or that their documents were irregular.

2. That they were released from prison in Gottenburg.

3. That they were exchanged as British subjects.

4. Were said to be impostors.

5. To have married in England.

6. Did not answer the descriptions given of them in their protections.

7. Had attempted to desert.

8. Were sent into the service for smuggling.

9. Were not to be found on board of the ship stated.

10. Had voluntarily entered into the British service.

11. Were natives of foreign countries, Prussia, Sweden, Italy, &c.

It is possible that some of the seamen, whose discharges were demanded, may not have been native citizens of the United States, but very presumable that the greater part were. Indeed, the pretext assigned for their detention seems to admit it. Had they been native subjects of England, being there, their origin might have been traced. But that is the ground in few instances only. In urging that some had no protections, or that their protections were irregular; that others had been exchanged as British prisoners; were impostors; had attempted to desert; did not answer the protections given them; were natives of Prussia, Sweden, &c.; it is fairly to be inferred that the public authority in England, to whom this duty is assigned, sought rather to evade the application than to justify the refusal. The pretext that some were natives of Prussia, Sweden, &c., deserves particular attention. On this circumstance the Secretary will remark only, that in extending impressment, in American vessels, to persons who could not be mistaken for British subjects, and refusing to surrender them, on application, to the voluntary service from which they were taken, it is evident that the recovery of the British seamen has not been the sole object of the practice.

By the report of the American Commissary of Prisoners in England, it appears that a considerable number of our seamen have been transferred from British ships of war to prisons; that their exchange for British seamen taken in battle was demanded in the first instance, but that that claim seems to have been since waived. It might have been expected that the British Government, on being satisfied that these men or that any of them were American citizens, would have liberated and sent them home at its own charge. They are, however, still held prisoners in confinement. That many of them, if not all, are native citizens cannot be doubted; for had the proof not been irresistible, it cannot be presumed, while so many others are detained on board British ships of war, that these would have been exempted from that service. That many are still detained on board British ships of war may be fairly inferred, even without other evidence, from the indiscriminate manner of British impressment; from the distant service in which the men thus impressed are often necessarily employed, depriving their friends of an opportunity to communicate with them; and from the inconsiderable number discharged, compared with that which has been demanded. Without relying altogether on the reports heretofore made to Congress by this department, the letter of Commodore Rodgers, hereunto annexed, affords data from which an estimate may be formed. On this point the correspondence between General Taylor and the Captain of the British ship the Dragon, and Commodore Decatur and Commodore Capel, deserve also particular attention. If the British Government would order a strict search to be made through the British navy for American seamen, it would then be seen how many of our native citizens have participated in the lot of the unfortunate men mentioned in the correspondences referred to.

The contrast which these documents present, in the pretensions and conduct of Great Britain, with the pretensions and conduct of the United States, cannot fail to make a deep impression in favor of the latter. The British Government impresses into its navy native citizens of the United States, and compels them to serve in it, and, in many instances, even to fight against their country; while it arrests as traitors, and menaces with death, persons suspected to be native British subjects, for having fought under our standard against British forces, although they had voluntarily entered into our army after having emigrated to the United States, and incorporated themselves into the American society. The United States, on the other hand, have forced no persons into their service, nor have they sought, nor are they disposed to punish any, who, after having freely emigrated to any part of the British dominions, and settled there, may have entered voluntarily into the British army.

The remaining inquiries relate to objects other than the immediate conduct of the parties in the present war. They demand information of the conduct of Great Britain and of other Powers in past times, without limitation in the retrospect, in circumstances bearing on the question of retaliation. The information required relates to the following points:

1st. The conduct of Great Britain and the other nations of Europe as to naturalization, and the employment in war, each of the subjects of the other.

2d. As to the punishment of their native subjects taken in arms against them in the service of other Powers.

3d. Examples of retaliation by the latter in such cases.

These inquiries necessarily involve an extensive research into the history and jurisprudence of the nations of Europe. For so important a task the other duties of the Secretary of State have altogether disqualified him since the call was made. The approaching close of the session does not leave him time for more than the following observations: That all the nations of Europe naturalize foreigners.

That they all employ in their service the subjects of each other, and frequently against their native countries, even when not regularly naturalized.

That they all allow their own subjects to emigrate to foreign countries.

That although examples may be found of the punishment of their native subjects taken in arms against them, the examples are few, and have either been marked by peculiar circumstances taking them out of the controverted principle, or have proceeded from the passions or policy of the occasion. Even in prosecutions and convictions having the latter origin, the final act of punishment has, with little exception, been prevented by a sense of equity and humanity, or a dread of retaliation. It is confidently believed that no instance can be found in which the alleged purposes of the enemy against the twenty-three prisoners in question, under all the circumstances which belong to their case, even should any of them not have been regularly naturalized, are countenanced by the proceedings of any European nation.

That if no instances occur of retaliation, in the few cases requiring it, or in any of them, by the Governments employing such persons, it has been, as is presumed, because the punishment which had been inflicted by the native country might be accounted for on some principle other than its denial of the right of emigration and naturalization. Had the Government, employing the persons so punished by their native country, retaliated in such cases, it might have incurred the reproach, either of countenancing acknowledged crimes, or of following the example of the other party in acts of cruelty, exciting horror rather than of fulfilling its pledge to innocent persons in support of rights fairly obtained, and sanctioned by the general opinion and practice of all the nations of Europe, ancient and modern.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

OFFICE OF COMM'RY GEN'L PRISONERS,

April 13, 1814.

SIR: In obedience to your instructions under the resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 9th of February, I have the honor to transmit you copies of the orders for retaliation which have issued from this office, and of such orders of like nature, on the part of the enemy, as have been received; together with copies of such official correspondence as has been held with the agents of the enemy, or other persons, in direct relation to the treatment of prisoners of war. With these are filed the official letters and papers furnished me from time to time by any of the departments of the Government, which are connected with either subject.

Each case, for the greater facility of reference, has been made up separately, without regard to dates, other than those of the papers immediately belonging to it. The cases marked from A to K relate to the treatment of prisoners, on account of which retaliation has been resorted to by one or both parties. The cases marked L relate to the treatment of prisoners, for which measures of retaliation have not yet been used by either party.

In the case A five of the men of the American sloop-of-war Nautilus were sent back from England to Halifax, and restored to the ordinary state of prisoners; when ten of the men of the British ship Guerriere, confined to answer for them at Boston, were immediately released. The sixth man of the Nautilus has not yet been accounted for; two men of the Guerriere are held as hostages for him.

In the case B the six men of the American private armed vessel Sarah Anne, confined at Jamaica, and threatened with trial, were given up. As soon as this fact was made known, the twelve British seamen set apart and confined at Charleston on their account, were released and placed among the prisoners for exchange.

In the case C, commencing with twenty-three prisoner soldiers of the United States' Army, transported by the enemy to England for trial, on pretext of being British subjects, all the officers and soldiers designated in retaliation on either side are yet held as hostages; although a partial relaxation has taken place on the part of the enemy, as well in regard to the manner of confinement of some of our officers, as in giving limited paroles. These departures from the first measures of severity, it will be seen, have been fully met by corresponding acts of indulgence to their officers similarly situated.

In the case D, Thomas King, one of the two American seamen confined at Bermuda, having, by singular enterprise and good fortune, effected his escape from the prison ship, and reached his country again in safety, after navigating the ocean for nine days, alone, in an open boat, the two British seamen in confinement on his account were released from the condition of hostages. John Stevens being still under accusation, in the hands of the enemy, the two men selected to answer for his safety are yet so held.

In the case E, it was regularly announced during last Winter, that Captain Nicholls was then considered by the enemy as an ordinary prisoner of war in their hands. So soon as it was known that the accusations brought against him were withdrawn, one of the British captains allotted to answer, in his person, for the safety and proper treatment of Captain Nicholls, was released from confinement, and admitted to parole. The other British captain has been retained in the same sort of confinement to which Captain Nicholls is yet subjected. It will be perceived that, latterly, it has been agreed that they both be released and exchanged against each other.

In the case F, it having been communicated, on the part of the enemy, that the sixteen maritime officers and seamen confined at Halifax in dungeons had been removed to more airy and wholesome prison rooms, first the officers, and then the men, and that their confinement in other respects had been made less rigid, the same mitigated course, step by step, was taken here with regard to their officers and men, who, in retaliation, had been subjected to a like severe treatment. As to the one hundred and one American seamen sent to England, as first stated by the agents of the enemy, for trial, the cause for so sending them was soon after disavowed as to eighty-three of them. As many British seamen held against them were then returned to the ordinary state of prisoners. There yet remain eighteen in close custody, subject to whatever treatment the enemy may use towards that number of our seamen of this class not satisfactorily accounted for.

For the fifty-nine American soldiers picked out and sent to England, first, on the plea of being British deserters, and then (this having been abandoned) that they had given themselves up as British subjects, fifty-nine British soldiers are yet held in separate and close confinement.

In the case G, of Joshua Penny; H, of John Swanton; I, of Thomas Goldsmith; and K, of Witmore Knaggs; for the proper treatment and safety of each of whom a British prisoner of corresponding rank and condition has been designated and confined; no relaxation having taken place on the other side, the several hostages so designated are yet held to answer, respectively, in their persons, for the ultimate measures of the enemy.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

J. MASON.

Extract of a letter from Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren to the Secretary of State, dated

BERMUDA, March 8, 1813.

I must refer you to my letter of the 30th of September, 1812, in which I stated the circumstance of twelve men belonging to the Guerriere, taken out of a cartel by Commodore Rodgers, and illegally detained, upon the pretext of six others, who were supposed to be British subjects, having been sent to the United Kingdom for examination; since that event, five of these people, named in the enclosed list, have been received at Halifax, with orders for their discharge. I therefore request that you will communicate these particulars to the President, in order that further directions may be given respecting the Guerriere's men, so long confined at Boston, and to obviate the other inconveniences which must inevitably arise from such practices.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Admiral Warren, dated

APRIL 16, 1813.

It appears by your letter, (of the 8th of March from Bermuda,) that five only of the seamen that were taken on board the Nautilus, and sent to England in confinement, have been returned; no account is given of the sixth. Orders have been issued for the release of ten of the twelve men, who, on a principle of retaliation, were confined by Commodore Rodgers at Boston.

You will be sensible that it will be impossible, on that principle, to discharge the other two men until the sixth American seamen is returned, or such an explanation given of the cause of his detention as, according to the circumstances of the case, regarding the conduct of the British Government towards American seamen under similar circumstances, ought to be satisfactory.

Colonel Barclay to General Mason.

GEORGETOWN, April 13, 1813.

SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to the latter paragraph in the document A, which I had the honor of enclosing in my letter to you of this day's date, and to request that the twelve British prisoners of war therein mentioned, formerly composing part of the crew of His Majesty's ship Guerriere, and taken out of a cartel by Commodore Rodgers, may be included in the first exchange of prisoners of war, as five of the six detained seamen of the United States' sloop of war Nautilus have been discharged at Halifax as American seamen.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Ten of the men detained of the late British ship Guerriere were, immediately after the date of Mr. Monroe's letter, released from duress, and placed in the ordinary situation of prisoners of war; and the Marshal of Massachusetts has orders to send them with the first British prisoners that go by cartel from Boston, &c.

SIR: A report having reached me that six of our prisoners are sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects, I have been induced to retaliate, by ordering twelve of the British prisoners to be detained as hostages until the fate of our citizens be known; their fate will decide the fate of yours. Colonel Barclay to General Mason.

HARLEM, June 1, 1813.

SIR: I beg leave to refer you to a communication, which took place some time in the Autumn or Winter preceding, between Mr. Baker, His Majesty's late agent for prisoners of war, and Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, respecting six of the crew of the late American privateer Sarah Ann, Richard Moon, master, captured by His Majesty's sloop Rhodian, John George Ross, Esq., commander, whose names are inserted in the margin, and who it appears were sent to Jamaica, to which station the Rhodian belonged, on suspicion of their being subjects of His Majesty; and I further request your attention to a letter from Major General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated "Headquarters, Charleston, November 4, 1812;" from which it appears, that twelve of His Majesty's subjects, then prisoners of war at Charleston, were held in prison to answer in their persons for the fate of the six men of the Sarah Ann privateer, sent to Jamaica.

I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter from Vice Admiral Stirling, commanding His Majesty's ships of war on the Jamaica station, to Mr. Simpson, late sub-agent for prisoners of war at Charleston; from which you will perceive that the six men of the Sarah Ann are considered by the Admiral as American prisoners generally, and are now on board a prison-ship, in common with other American prisoners.

Having given you this information with respect to the six men of the Sarah Ann privateer, I have to request you will take the necessary measures to have the contingent responsibility, which it was thought proper to attach to the persons of twelve British seamen, now in prison in Charleston, taken off, and that they may be informed thereof.

I understand that John Gaul, one of the six men, was paroled, and arrived at Georgetown, South Carolina, in the brig Cyrus, and that he reported himself to the marshal, who informed Mr. Simpson "that he had sent on to the Department of State his parole."

I have the honor to be, &c.

SHARK, PORT ROYAL, JAMAICA,

SIR: Captain Mowbray, of His Majesty's sloop Moselle, has just sent to me the copy of a letter from you to him, and another to Mr. Cook, of His Majesty's late sloop Rhodian, dated the 25th ultimo, respecting six men mentioned in the margin,* who were sent here from the Bahamas, as having been taken in the American privateer Sarah Ann, and supposed to be subjects of His Majesty; but, as no proof to what country they belong has been adduced, it has never been my intention to bring them to trial, and they are at present on board of the prison-ships, waiting an exchange of prisoners. I am, sir, yours, &c.

CHARLES STIRLING,
Vice Admiral.

CHAS. R. SIMPSON, Esq.

OFFICE-COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, June 9, 1813.

SIR: I learn with pleasure, by the letter you did me the honor to address me on the 1st instant, and the letter from Admiral Stirling you have enclosed, that the six men belonging to the American privateer Sarah Ann, detained in October last, and sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects, have been restored to the ordinary state of prisoners of war, to wait an exchange, and that there is now no intention to bring them to trial.

I very cheerfully comply with your request, sir, and have this day requested the Marshal of South Carolina to restore, in like manner, to the ordinary state of prisoners of war, the twelve British seamen confined under the orders of this Government by him, and to inform them that the responsibility attached to their persons for the safety of the men of the Sarah Ann has been taken off.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1813.

SIR: I think it my duty to lay before the Department, that, on the arrival at Quebec of the American prisoners of war surrendered at Queens-town, they were mustered and examined by British officers appointed to that duty, and every native born of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland sequestered and sent on board a ship of war then in that harbor. The vessel, in a few days thereafter, sailed for England with those persons on board.

Between fifteen and twenty persons were thus taken from us, principally natives of Ireland, several of whom were known by their platoon officers to be naturalized citizens of the United States, and others to have been long residents within the same. One, in particular, whose name has escaped me, besides having complied with all the conditions of our naturalization laws, was represented by his officers to have left a wife and five children, all of them born within the State of New York.

I distinctly understood, as well from the officers who came on board the prison-ship for the above purpose, as from others with whom I remonstrated on this subject, that it was the determination of the British Government, as expressed through Sir George Prevost, to punish every man whom it might subject to its power, found in arms against the British King, contrary to his native allegiance.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. SCOTT,

Lieut. Col. U. S. 2d artillery.

HON. SECRETARY OF WAR.

LONDON, March 1, 1813.

SIR: Annexed you have a copy of a letter from Henry Kelly, in behalf of himself and twenty-two persons. He states that they are all citizens of the United States, and have wives and children there; that they were taken last October, in Upper Canada, and that they were sent to this country because they were born within the British dominions. I am, respectfully, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

To the SECRETARY OF STATE.

ON BOARD H. M. SHIP NAMUR,
LYING AT THE NORE, FEB. 6, 1813.

SIR: This is to inform you of the under-named twenty-three American soldiers belonging to the 13th, 6th, and 1st regiments of the United States' armies. We were taken on the 13th of October, in Upper Canada. The reason of their sending us twenty-three here is, we were born in the British dominions, though we are all citizens of the United States, and have our wives and children there. We are in a very miserable situation for clothing, having drawn no winter clothes before we were taken. We therefore hope you will send us some relief to shelter us from the inclemency of the weather.

Sir, I remain your obedient servant,

HENRY KELLY.

Sir, these are the names of my fellow-sufferers: Henry Blaney, George McCammon, John Dolton, Michael Condin, John Clark, Peter Burr, Andrew Doyle, John McGowan, James Gill, John Fulsum, Patrick McBraharty, Matthew Mooney, Patrick Karns, John Fitzgerald, John Wiley, John Donnelly, John Curry, Nathan Shaley, Edward McGarrigan, John Dinne, John Williams, George Johnson.

Mr. R. G. BEASLEY.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 15, 1813.

SIR: You will herewith receive the copy of a letter addressed to the Secretary of State by R. G. Beasley, Esq., our commissary of prisoners in London, by which it appears, that twenty-three soldiers of the 1st, 6th, and 13th regiments of the United States' infantry, made prisoners during the last campaign in Upper Canada, have been sent to England in confinement, as British subjects.

You are therefore hereby commanded to put into close confinement twenty-three British soldiers, to be kept as hostages, for the safe keeping and restoration (on exchange) of the soldiers of the United States who have been sent as above stated to England.

So soon as this order shall have been executed, you will communicate the reasons of it to the British Commander-in-chief in Canada.

Very respectfully, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

To Major General DEARBORN.

HEADQUARTERS, MONTREAL,
October 17, 1813.

SIR: Having transmitted to His Majesty's Government a copy of a letter addressed to me on the 31st of May last, by Major General Dearborn, in which it is stated that "the American commissary of prisoners in London had made it known to his Government that twenty-three soldiers of the 1st, 6th, and 13th regiments of United States' infantry, made prisoners, had been sent to England, and held in close confinement as British subjects, and that Major General Dearborn had received instructions from his Government to put into close confinement twenty-three British soldiers, to be kept as hostages for the safe-keeping and restoration, on exchange, of the soldiers of the United States, who had been sent, as above stated, to England; and that, in obedience to those instructions, General Dearborn had put twenty-three British soldiers in close confinement, to be kept as hostages;" I have now the honor of acquainting you, that I have received the instructions of His Majesty's Government distinctly to state to you, for the information of the Government of the United States, that I have received the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, forthwith to put in close confinement forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers, to be held as hostages for the safe-keeping of the twenty-three British soldiers stated to have been put in close confinement by order of the American Government.

I have been directed at the same time to apprise you, that, if any of the said British soldiers shall suffer death by reason that any of the said soldiers of the United States, now under confinement in England, have been found guilty, and that the known law, not only of Great Britain, but of every independent State, under similar circumstances, has been in consequence executed, that I have been further instructed to select out of the American officers and non-commissioned officers whom I shall have put into confinement, as many as may double the number of the British soldiers who shall have been so unwarrantably put to death, and to cause such officers and non-commissioned officers to suffer death immediately. I have been further instructed by His Majesty's Government to notify to you, for the information of the Government of the United States, that the commanders of His Majesty's armies and fleets on the coasts of America have received instructions to prosecute the war with unmitigated severity against all cities, towns, and villages, belonging to the United States, and against the inhabitants thereof, if, after this communication shall have been made to you, and a reasonable time given for its being transmitted to the American Government, that Government shall unhappily not be deterred from putting to death any of the soldiers who now are, or who may hereafter be, kept as hostages for the purposes stated in the letter from Major General Dearborn.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your Excellency's obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE PREVOST,

Lt. Gen. and Com'dr of the Forces.

His Exc'y Maj. Gen. WILKINSON.

Extract of a letter from Major General James Wilkinson to Lieutenant General Sir George Prevost.

HEADQUARTERS, GRENADIER ISLAND,
November 1, 1813.

I yesterday evening had the honor to receive your letter of the 17th past, and shall immediately transmit a copy of it to the Executive of the United States.

I forbear to animadvert on the acts of our superiors, whatever may be their tendency; but you must pardon me for taking exception to an expression in your letter. The Government of the United States cannot be "deterred" by any considerations of life or death, of depredations or conflagration, from the faithful discharge of its duty to the American nation.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Nov. 18, 1813.

SIR: This despatch will be delivered or forwarded to you by Major Richard Graham of the army. You will be pleased to deliver to him all the commissioned enemy officers in your charge, belonging to any of their land troops not militia, whether captured on land or on board their vessels. They are to be immediately marched under guard to Frankfort, in Kentucky, and their subsistence money to cease from the time you so deliver them. You are particularly requested, however, to give them all the aid in your power, and to see justice done them in the settlement of their accounts of their boarding houses, and in the delivery of their baggage, &c. You will use the requisite precautions, in concert with Major Graham, to hold up the disclosure of this measure until all the officers designated are secured by him. You will then inform those gentlemen that this measure has been forced on us by the recent treatment of our officers held by the enemy in Canada. I am sir, &c.

J. MASON.

THOMAS STEELE, Esq.,
Deputy Marshal of Ohio.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Nov. 23, 1813.

SIR: In order to secure a sufficient number of hostages to answer in their persons for the proper treatment of a certain number of American officers now in possession of the enemy, on whom the British authorities have recently threatened to exercise a severity unknown in civilized warfare, and outraging humanity, I am commanded by the President to instruct you to place forthwith in close confinement all the British commissioned officers of every rank belonging to their land service, now prisoners of war within your district, and safely to hold them until further orders.

By the last returns from your deputy, Mr. Melville, there are supposed to be, as by the annexed list, sixteen persons; but be the number more or less, you will understand the whole are to be embraced by the present order.

The place of confinement is left to your discretion; in making this selection, however, you will endeavor to fix on a town which will offer a sufficient number of safe and decent prison rooms to receive those officers, without inconveniently crowding them; the object being at this time to hold them, with as little suffering on their part as can be done consistent with security against escape, for ultimate measures dependent on the conduct of the enemy; and you are requested, for the better ordering of the first arrangement, to attend in person.

By this same mail an order will be transmitted from the Department of War to General Cushing, commanding at Boston, requiring him to act in concert with you on this occasion, and to furnish a well appointed and adequate guard for the purpose of securing the prisoners in the first instance, moving them to the place of confinement, and there guarding them in prison.

You will at once perceive, sir, that the service now required of you is of an important and delicate nature. The President counts on your zeal and discretion to execute it with promptitude, and such precautions as may be necessary to prevent escapes, which may possibly be attempted by some, although on parole; to which end, you will consult confidentially with General Cushing. Since, immediately on taking them into close custody, their paroles will be suspended, then also must the subsistence money be stopped, and you will make arrangements, in some regular way for supplying, in as comfortable manner as the nature of the case will admit, those unfortunate officers with good, wholesome fare, lodging, firing, &c.; having always regard to the proper economy.

You are particularly requested to make as early a return as possible, after this measure is executed, of the persons confined, descriptive of name, to what corps belonging, rank, place of nativity, last place of residence, &c.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,
J. MASON.

JAMES PRINCE, Esq.,
Marshal of Massachusetts.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Nov. 24, 1823.

SIR: Enclosed I send you a copy of a letter addressed to you on the 18th instant,* under cover to Major Graham.

In order to secure a sufficient number of hostages to answer in their persons for the proper treatment of a certain number of American officers now in possession of the enemy, on whom the British authorities have recently threatened to exercise a severity unknown in civilized warfare, and outraging humanity, I am commanded by the President to instruct you to place forthwith in close confinement, at Frankfort, in your State, all the British officers, of whatever rank, who may be there delivered to you by Major Richard Graham of the army, as contemplated in my letter of the 18th instant; and, for the better making the first arrangements, you are requested to attend in person at the place, at the time Major Graham shall arrive there with the prisoners. Frankfort has been designated as the place of confinement on this occasion, because it was hoped that the authorities of the State would accommodate the Government with rooms in the penitentiary. The Secretary of State has addressed the Governor on the subject. You will be pleased to make application to his Excellency to that end in its behalf, and pray leave of him to occupy in that building as many safe and decent prison rooms as may be sufficient to receive these officers, without inconveniently crowding them; the object being at this time to hold them, with as little suffering on their part as can be done consistent with security against escape, for ultimate measures dependent on the conduct of the enemy.

The requisite guard, duly appropriated, will be furnished you by Major Graham, for guarding the prison. You will make arrangements, in the regular way, for supplying, in as comfortable a manner as the nature of the case will admit, these unfortunate officers with good, wholesome fare, lodging, and firing; having always regard to the proper economy.

You will at once perceive, sir, that the service now requested of you is of an important and delicate nature. The President counts on your zeal and discretion to execute it with promptitude, and with such precautions as may prevent escape. You are particularly requested to make as early a return as possible, after this measure is executed, of the persons confined, descriptive of name, to what corps belonging, rank, place of nativity, last place of residence, &c.

I am, sir, &c.
ROBERT CROCKETT, Esq., Marshal.

Colonel Barclay to the Commissary Gen'l of Prisoners.
HARLEM, November 26, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose to you the copy of a letter from his Excellency Lieutenant

* This letter was a duplicate of that sent to Thomas Steele, Esq., deputy marshal of Ohio.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

General Sir George Prevost, Governor General and commanding His Majesty's forces, on the subject of his having confined forty-six officers and non-commissioned officers, American prisoners of war, in retaliation for twenty-three British prisoners confined in prison in these States, by order of this Government.

If it is the wish of the President or yourself to be possessed of a copy of Earl Bathurst's letter referred to in the enclosed copy, I will send it with pleasure. It has, however, been published in the American newspapers, taken from those published in Canada.

MONTREAL, October 27, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a despatch I have received from Earl Bathurst, and to acquaint you that, in obedience to the orders of His Majesty's Government therein signified to me, I have placed twenty officers and twenty-six non-commissioned officers of the American army, whose names are enclosed, in close confinement. Three general officers, and twelve other officers of different ranks, according to the list herewith transmitted, still remain at Quebec, on parole; but the remainder of the soldiers and seamen, amounting to about five hundred men, I have thought fit to send to Halifax, not having the means of providing for them during the Winter.

Regretting, as I sincerely do, this necessary act of severity and retaliation, which I have communicated to Major General Wilkinson, I have thought fit to apprise you of it, that you may, should any representation be made to you upon the subject, be enabled to point out to the American Government the cause of it, and the means in its power of relieving those who are suffering from it, by the immediate discharge from confinement of the twenty-three British soldiers, prisoners of war, so unjustly imprisoned.

SIR: In my letter to you of the 1st ultimo, I apprized you that your communication of the 17th of October last had been transmitted to the President of the United States; and I have now the honor to lay before you the result.

In a recent communication from the War Department, I am commanded by the President to make known to you, in reply to your letter, and for the information of your Government, that the Government of the United States, adhering unalterably to the principle and purpose declared in the communication of General Dearborn to you, on the subject of the twenty-three American soldiers, prisoners of war, sent to England to be tried as criminals, and the confinement of a like number of British soldiers, prisoners of war, selected to abide the fate of the former, has, in consequence of the step taken by the British Government, as now communicated, ordered forty-six British officers into close confinement, who will be immediately put to death in case of the putting to death of the forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers ordered into close confinement until it shall be known that the forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers in question are no longer confined.

I am further commanded by the President to advise you, for the information of your Government, that in the event of any proceedings of the British commanders on our coast against the inhabitants thereof, contrary to the laws of war observed among civilized nations, as threatened in your communication of the 17th of October, the United States will avail themselves of the means in their power for such exemplary retaliations as may produce a return to those legitimate modes of warfare, from which no other consideration than the necessity imposed by the conduct of the enemy could ever induce them to depart.

Extract of a letter from Sir George Prevost, commanding the British forces in Canada, to Major General Wilkinson.

HEADQUARTERS, MONTREAL,
December 11, 1813.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your Excellency's despatches of the 3d and 4th instant. In communicating to your Excellency, in my letter of the 17th of October last, the retaliating measure which His Majesty's Government had been compelled to adopt, in consequence of the imprisonment, by Major General Dearborn, of twenty-three British soldiers, as hostages for as many natural born subjects of His Majesty found in the service of the United States in arms against their native country, I had entertained the hope that the American Government would have been induced to abandon a principle not recognised by any of the other civilized nations of the world, and against which, when attempted to be put in practice, they have all invariably resisted.

I regret to find myself disappointed in this just expectation, by the communication made by your Excellency of the determination of your Government unalterably to adhere to the principle and purpose declared in the letter of Major General Dearborn of the 31st of May last, and of its having, in consequence, directed forty-six British officers, prisoners of war, to be closely confined until the forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers, now closely confined at Quebec as hostages, shall be released.

This step on the part of the Government of the United States leaves me no other alternative but that of directing, and which I have accordingly done, the whole of the American officers (including the general officers) now on their parole in these provinces, to be immediately placed in close confinement; and I have further to acquaint your Excellency, that it is my determination to put into close confinement every American officer who shall hereafter fall into my power, to the number of forty-six, inclusive of those who had been confined previous to the receipt of your Excellency's letter, and so to keep them confined until I shall receive the further directions of His Majesty's Government on this subject.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to Lieutenant General Sir George Prevost, commanding the British forces in Canada, dated

HEADQUARTERS, MALONE, Dec. 20, 1813.

SIR: Your Excellency's letter of the 11th instant reached my outpost, on Chateaugai, the evening of the 18th, and came to my hand yesterday.

I regret the resolution you have adopted in respect to the retaliatory system forced on the Executive of the United States by the resurrection of dormant pretensions which had ceased for a long time to torment mankind, and which (your Excellency will pardon the observation) have not been invariably asserted by the British Government. Several instances might be quoted to support the fact; but I will trespass the remarkable case of the late Major General Charles Lee only on your Excellency's attention, because it is most directly in point. Some time after the capture of that officer by Colonel Harcourt, his exchange was demanded by Congress, and refused by the British commander on the express grounds for which you now contend; in consequence of which, Lieutenant Colonel Campbell, of the seventy-first regiment, and five Hessian field officers, were thrown into ignominious confinement, as hostages for his safety; and here the contest terminated—the British Government yielding its pretensions, and admitting General Lee to be exchanged as an ordinary prisoner of war. But while I deplore the course you have marked out for your conduct, I should fail in courtesy if I did not acknowledge my obligations to you for the candid avowal of your intentions in respect to the American officers who may hereafter fall into your hands, because this avowal will, I flatter myself, constitute their safeguard against imprisonment.

HARLEM, December 15, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you a copy of a letter received yesterday from Lieutenant Colonel Grant, of the militia of Lower Canada, dated from the jail at Worcester; and I have to request you will inform me for whom the nine British officers and the volunteer mentioned therein have been placed in a more than ordinary state of strict retaliatory confinement. I had understood from you, that the officers and men on whom you intended to retaliate for the fifty-nine soldiers sent to England, and the forty-six placed in close confinement, by way of retaliation, by his Excellency Sir George Prevost, were those at Newport and Chillicothe; and I am certain that the officers now in jail at Worcester, who are a part of the British troops captured by Commodore Chauncey on Lake Ontario, are a part of the British prisoners you promised me should be sent from Salem, in return for the military prisoners now daily expected from Nova Scotia. Why your original plan has been changed, and what British prisoners are intended to be released by you and sent to Halifax for the Americans expected at Salem, are questions to which I entreat your answer. I beg also to be informed on what principles you have directed restrictions, independent of the strictest imprisonment, to be exercised on them; and whether they receive the usual allowance of three shillings sterling per day. These are important questions to be resolved, and admit not of my being kept in suspense.

SIR: From the tenor of your letter of the 22d of October, addressed to Lieutenant Colonel Myers, I was led to expect that an arrangement for the mutual exchange of prisoners had been made between the two Governments, by which the British prisoners then in the United States were to be immediately marched to Burlington for that purpose. On application to the deputy marshal at Pittsfield, I was informed that he had received a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners, instructing him that all prisoners taken after the 5th of October were to be exchanged by the way of Halifax. It was in vain I complained of the unreasonableness of this measure. I was informed that the arrangement was decisive, and that a cartel was expected from Halifax in a short time for that purpose.

Finding that it would be useless to make any further remonstrance, I proceeded to Worcester on my parole, that I might be enabled to take advantage of the opportunity which, I was informed, would shortly offer for my exchange. I have now the honor to inform you that, by an order from the President of the United States, I have, with the undermentioned officers, been placed in close confinement, notwithstanding the assurances which have been so frequently made me of my being exchanged, without any regard to my being a militia officer, and the only instance of the kind which has presented itself during the war, that of a militia officer being even detained in the United States.

THOMAS BARCLAY, Esq.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

HARLEM, December 21, 1813.

SIR: In my letter to you of the 15th current, I stated, in addition to other matters, the more than ordinary severity of the treatment Colonel Grant and the nine other British prisoners, committed to Worcester jail by the Marshal of Massachusetts, experienced. I am since informed that, in order to render their situation still more unpleasant, they have, with the exception of one, been deprived of their servants, who have been marched to Boston or Salem as prisoners; and that their confinement, in every other respect, is the reverse of what gentlemen, even under sentence of death, ought to experience. I hope this treatment and privation have been exercised without the knowledge of the American Government.

The treatment which the American officers in close confinement within His Majesty's colonies receive, is very different, and in every particular as liberal and comfortable as the nature of their imprisonment will permit. In proof of this, I enclose a copy of a letter published some days since in the Philadelphia Gazette, purporting to be a letter from a captain in the United States' service, a prisoner in Quebec, to his father. The letter, I consider, bears strong marks of authenticity.

Having stated the treatment that British prisoners in these States, and American prisoners in His Majesty's dominions, both placed in strict confinement on retaliatory principles, receive, it rests with your Government to procure a continuation of the same comforts and conveniences to its prisoners which they now enjoy, by immediately directing that similar indulgences be extended to British subjects in these States under similar circumstances; or to compel His Majesty's Government to direct that the same severity be exercised towards American prisoners which His Majesty's subjects experience under their confinement in these States.

Should your Government, upon this representation, think proper to adopt the former of these alternatives, you will be pleased to return me the enclosed letter. On the contrary, should a continuance of the severity and privation be considered necessary on the part of the United States, permit me to request that you will do me the favor to forward the enclosed letter, by a flag of truce, to his excellency Lieutenant General Sir George Prevost.

A return of the servants to the officers is necessary, or at least in the proportion of one servant to two officers. I am under the necessity of requesting an answer to this.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
 THOMAS BARCLAY.
 General MASON, &c.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Colonel Thomas Barclay, dated

WASHINGTON, December 26, 1813.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries of the 15th instant, relative to Lieutenant Colonel Grant, and other British officers, confined in the State of Massachusetts, (first reminding you, as you have before been apprized, that it has been uniformly the practice of this Government, in matters of retaliation, to execute the measure intended before any official communication was made,) I have the honor to inform you that these officers have been so placed, to answer, in part, for the safety and proper treatment of the forty-six American officers, commissioned and non-commissioned, confined in the common jail at Quebec, a measure announced as determined on by the letter of the 17th October, from General Sir George Prevost to Major General Wilkinson, the execution of which was made known to me by your letter of the 26th November. Orders have been given for the confinement of other British commissioned officers in Massachusetts and elsewhere, to the number of forty-six, including those named by you, for the same purpose. So soon as the returns shall be received, they will be communicated to you.

The reply to your inquiry, on what principle restrictions have been directed, independent of the strictest imprisonment, to be exercised on your officers, is, that none such have been directed; and as to what you term more than ordinary state of strict retaliatory confinement, since you have not been pleased to furnish me with any evidence of the manner in which our officers have been treated in their jail, it is not in my power to enter now upon that part of the subject. I will assure you, however, that orders were given to show to your officers, whose close confinement has been made necessary by a previous act of your Government, all the mildness, and to afford them all the accommodation consistent with their unfortunate situation; and that the requisite inquiries have been made as to the execution of the intention of this Government. The paroles of these officers having been suspended, in lieu of the three shillings sterling per day, directions were given to supply their tables with good, plain fare, and their rooms with sufficient fuel and comfortable bedding; and, from the character of the marshal in whose custody they are, I cannot doubt that this has been done.

You could never have understood from me, sir, that it was intended to retaliate, at any given place, for the violent conduct of your Government in placing in jail forty-six of our officers at Quebec. This highly offensive and novel procedure was not known in this country at the time you last left the seat of Government, and you will find nothing written from me to that effect. There is no doubt that the British officers now imprisoned at Worcester, in Massachusetts, to whom you allude, make part of the troops I proposed should have been sent to Halifax, by return of the British cartel which you engaged should bring over to Salem, from that place, such of our land troops as had been carried there from Quebec; nor is there less doubt that the forty-six American officers, a list of whom you have furnished me in your letter of the 26th November, are part of the American prisoner troops you engaged with me should be immediately released from Canada; the soldiers and non-commissioned officers to be delivered on the lines, and the commissioned officers to be paroled, to return directly on the reception of your despatches by your commanding officer in Canada, in return for a like number to be released to you; with which arrangement your commanding General in Canada has refused to comply, even as to those he yet holds there, uninterfered with by retaliatory measures. When your cartel shall arrive from Halifax with American prisoners, I shall have from the adjacent depots a corresponding number of British prisoners to be returned by her. But in the uncertainty of a disposition according with your arrangements, as evinced by the late experiment in Canada, it is certainly best for your prisoners, and most prudent on my part, that they should not be removed until we are more certainly informed of the coming of our prisoners.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Dec. 26, 1813.

SIR: In your letter of the 26th ultimo, transmitting copy of a letter from Sir George Prevost of the 27th October, and a list of forty-six American officers confined in jail at Quebec, you offer to furnish, if desired, a copy of a letter from Earl Bathurst to Sir George Prevost; as that paper forms part of the documents in the case to which your communication has reference, I will thank you to send it to me.

Returns of all the prisoners, confined in retaliation in this country, shall be sent you as soon as they can be made complete. I have, &c.

Col. THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Dec. 29, 1813.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 21st inst., I beg leave to assure you, that it is very far from the intention of this Government, or the desire of any of its officers charged with that painful service, to cause to be felt by British officers confined in retaliation for the American officers put in jail in Quebec, more inconvenience than has been made necessary by the conduct of the enemy in regard to our officers, on whose account they are so held.

Before you advanced such a declaration as the following: "I am since informed that, in order to render their situation still more unpleasant, they have, with the exception of one, been deprived of their servants, who have been marched to Boston, or Salem, as prisoners; and that their confinement, in every other respect, is the reverse of what gentlemen, even under the sentence of death, ought to experience. I hope this treatment and privation have been exercised without the knowledge of the American Government;" it is to be regretted that you had not taken pains to have been better informed. The unfortunate situation of these gentlemen is sincerely to be lamented; when confined in a jail, however, you must see the impossibility of making them as comfortable as, from their habits and rank in life, would be otherwise desirable. But that they have been treated with unnecessary severity is positively denied, as having been in any degree directed or countenanced by the Government, nor is it believed as practised by the officer in whose charge they are. You might, sir, at least, on this occasion, have refrained from attributing unworthy motives. If their servants have been withdrawn, they shall be restored so soon as it is ascertained that our officers, closely confined, receive that accommodation. It is the intention of this Government to make their situation in every respect similar to that of our officers held in prison, and, to that end, we shall be very glad to receive from you any information you may be able to communicate; but you must permit me, sir, to say, that we cannot take the anonymous newspaper paragraphs you have sent for authority on that subject.

You will remark, sir, by the documents sent you in my letter of yesterday, that Colonel Gardner, our agent at Quebec, has been refused permission to visit them; he may, therefore, not have been able to give me any information about their situation. I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MASON.

Col. THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

I, Timothy Whiting, of Lancaster, in the county of Worcester, do testify and say, that being at Worcester on the day of the commitment of the British officers, (meaning those who had been at Worcester on parole,) I heard the marshal direct Doctor Lincoln (his reputed agent for taking care of prisoners) to be particularly careful, and see that they were treated with great humanity, and well provided with good and wholesome provisions, bedding, &c. The marshal appeared very solicitous that the humanity of the United States should not suffer from any neglect in this respect; and he observed to Doctor Lincoln, that by the cartel three shillings sterling per day was allowed to each gentleman for subsistence, and he presumed there would be no objection to his allowing to the extent of four dollars per week; that it was not intended that these officers should be served with prison beds, as, for this additional sum, the jailor would provide good, comfortable beds for them. This was fully acquiesced in by Doctor Lincoln and myself, and our official situation, as county officers connected with the jail, enabled us to know, and to state to the marshal, that it was in the power of the jailor to furnish as good bedding as is generally found in the best public houses in Worcester, and we had no doubt of the jailor's humane disposition. These observations were made to the marshal, from the solicitude he discovered to have the officers treated with all the kindness and attention which, he said, he thought was due to men so peculiarly situated as these officers were, and which could be done consistent with their safe-keeping.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Barclay to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

JANUARY 6, 1814.

Agreeably to your request of the 26th ultimo, I enclose a copy of Earl Bathurst's letter to Lieutenant General Sir George Prevost of the 12th of August.

DOWNING STREET, Aug. 12, 1813.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your despatch No. 66, of the 6th June, enclosing a letter addressed to your Excellency by Major General Dearborn. In this letter it is stated that the American Commissary of Prisoners in London had made it known to his Government, that twenty-three soldiers, of the first, sixth, and thirteenth regiments United States' infantry, made prisoners, had been sent to England, and held in close confinement as British subjects; and that Major General Dearborn had received instructions from his Government to put into close confinement twenty-three British soldiers, to be kept as hostages for the safe-keeping and restoration, in exchange, of the soldiers of the United States who had been sent, as above stated, to England; and General Dearborn apprizes you, that, in obedience to those instructions, he had put twenty-three British soldiers in close confinement, to be kept as hostages.

The persons referred to in this letter were soldiers serving in the American army, taken prisoners at Queenstown, and sent home by you, that they might be disposed of according to the pleasure of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, they having declared themselves to be British born subjects. Your Excellency has been directed to send home the necessary evidence upon this point, and they are held in custody to undergo a legal trial.

You will lose no time in communicating to Major General Dearborn that you have transmitted home a copy of his letter to you, and that you are, in consequence, instructed distinctly to state to him that you have received the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent forthwith to put in close confinement forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers, to be held as hostages for the safe-keeping of the twenty-three British soldiers stated to have been put in close confinement by order of the American Government; and you will, at the same time, apprise him that, if any of the said British soldiers shall suffer death, by reason that the soldiers now under confinement here have been found guilty, and that the known law, not only of Great Britain, but of every independent State, under similar circumstances, has been in consequence executed, you have been instructed to select out of the American officers and non-commissioned officers, whom you shall have put into close confinement, as many as may double the number of British soldiers who shall have been so unwarrantably put to death, and cause such officers and non-commissioned officers to suffer death immediately.

And you are further instructed to notify to Major General Dearborn, that the commanders of His Majesty's armies and fleets on the coasts of America have received instructions to prosecute the war with unmitigated severity against all cities, towns, and villages, belonging to the United States, and against the inhabitants thereof, if, after this communication shall have been duly made to Major General Dearborn, and a reasonable time given for its being transmitted to the American Government, that Government shall unhappily not be deterred from putting to death any of the soldiers who now are, or who may hereafter be, kept as hostages, for the purposes stated in the letter from Major General Dearborn.

I have the honor to be, &c.

BATHURST.

To Sir GEORGE PREVOST, Bart. &c.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Colonel Thomas Barclay.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you extracts of letters lately received from Colonel Gardner, American agent for prisoners in Canada, to wit: one of the 25th of November and 17th of December, and a copy of a letter from him of the 10th of December, accompanied by copies of a correspondence between him and General Glasgow, to say, of the 8th and 9th of December from Colonel Gardner, and of the 9th and 10th from General Glasgow.

By these you will perceive that now the American agent is barred altogether from visiting any prisoner in confinement, and that when he is permitted even to go into the lower town of Quebec, where no prisoners are held, to purchase any articles or transact any business for them, he is guarded and restricted to a few hours.

In consequence of the last paragraph of the letter from Colonel Gardner of the 17th of December, and the relaxation of the commanding officer in Canada, towards some of our officers, I have with pleasure found myself enabled to ameliorate, in a degree, the situation of your officers of corresponding rank. I have instructed the Marshal of Kentucky to offer to the British field officers now confined at Frankfort a parole, restricting them to such houses and their premises as they can most conveniently be located in; in this order I have included Majors Chambers and Muir, understanding that they are majors by brevet, and Captain Crowther, because he has his family with him; to his lady and two small children, who, I understand, compose his family, I have directed to be paid subsistence equal to one and a half of the sum of the allowance to officers of the rank of her husband, to wit: at the rate of four shillings and sixpence sterling per day.

I enclose you a list of all the officers now confined in the State of Kentucky; so soon as I can receive the reports from the other marshals, they shall be furnished.

JANUARY 27, 1814.

I am directed to acquaint you that, if it is the wish of your Government to release the whole or a part of the officers and men now in confinement on retaliatory measures, on its releasing British prisoners so confined, a similar number of American prisoners under the same kind of confinement, and of the same rank, shall be forthwith released in Canada and Nova Scotia, and be succeeded by an immediate exchange.

In your letter of the 27th of January, you state that you are directed to acquaint me, that if it is the wish of this Government to release the whole or a part of the officers and men now in confinement on retaliatory measures, on the release of British prisoners so confined, a similar number of American prisoners under the same kind of confinement, and of the same rank, shall be forthwith released in Canada and Nova Scotia.

If you mean that all officers and men, prisoners of war, on either side, who have been confined in retaliation, or for whose confinement measures of retaliation have been resorted to, shall now be released by both Governments, your proposition will be promptly assented to; or if it is meant that leaving in each case which has occurred, those who constituted the first step of rigorous confinement on each side, to stand the one designation against the other, and to release all others held in retaliation by either nation, it will be as readily agreed to, and stipulated that exchanges for those so released, according to rank and equivalent, shall immediately follow.

If I have understood you correctly as to either mode of proceeding on this important subject, I am instructed, sir, to inform you that this Government will enter with the least possible delay on such arrangements as may be found best calculated to relieve the sufferings of the unfortunate persons implicated on both sides.

FEBRUARY 10, 1814.

Your letter of the 4th instant I have received. I had hoped I had expressed myself with so much perspicuity in my letter of the 27th of January, that my meaning would have been perfectly understood by you.

If you will examine that letter, you will find the proposal therein contained to relate to a general exchange of all the prisoners of war, including those under confinement on retaliatory principles. In answer to your question, whether it was intended to include in my proposal to you "those for whose confinement measures of retaliation have been resorted to," I beg leave to say it was not.

With respect to characters of that description, I have no authority to make any proposition.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Thomas Steele, Esq., Deputy Marshal of Ohio, dated

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29, 1814.

It has become necessary, in order to meet by corresponding measures the treatment used by the enemy towards our officers in their power, to confine all British officers remaining in your custody.

I enclose you a despatch from the Department of War to Lieutenant Colonel Campbell, commanding officer at Chillicothe, requesting him to furnish an officer and guard to conduct safely to Kentucky such of the British officers as you may deliver him. You will keep the contents of this despatch entirely to yourself, until you see and deliver the despatch to Colonel Campbell, and you will consult confidentially with him as to the measures to be taken to secure all the officers before any alarm is excited, in order to prevent escapes.

By your last returns it appears that you held, of the army, two cadets; of the navy, five lieutenants, two masters, three midshipmen, and six masters' mates.

These and other officers or cadets of the British army or navy you may hold, of rank not lower than those designated, if I should have mistaken your returns, are by order of the President immediately to be placed in close confinement, and delivered to Colonel Campbell, to be conducted to Frankfort, in Kentucky, there to be delivered to the Marshal of that State.

You will be pleased, as requested in the former order on a similar occasion, to conduct this procedure with all the humanity and tenderness the case may be susceptible of, guarding always against risk of escape; and you will pay all the officers up the arrearages due to the time that the paroles are suspended, and see every justice done them in settling their accounts, &c., with the inhabitants.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to the Marshal of Massachusetts, dated

FEBRUARY 8, 1814.

The British authorities at Quebec and Halifax having thought proper to confine closely a number of officers, (over and above the forty-six first confined at Quebec,) on plea of retaliation for their officers confined in the United States, to be held for the safety and proper treatment of these, I am commanded by the President to instruct you to confine closely at Pittsfield, and to place under military guard all the officers British prisoners who may have been returned by your deputy, Major Melville, from Burlington, Vermont, to the State of Massachusetts, a list of whose names was forwarded you yesterday, presumed in number to be nineteen or twenty. You will be pleased, as in similar cases, and as heretofore recommended, to inform the officers the cause of their confinement, and to do all that may depend on you to make their situation as comfortable as possible consistent with safety against escape.

FEBRUARY 22, 1814.

In mine of the 11th I requested my order, as to the confinement of the officers to be returned from Burlington to Cheshire, to be suspended. I have before me yours of the 14th, informing me of the prompt measures you had taken to execute my order of the 8th; as I had advised Major Melville by the same mail of my intentions to suspend the order for a few days, it is probable they were not executed; but be this as it may, I have now, by command of the President, to require you to deliver over to Major Sizer, to be conducted by such route as he may prefer, avoiding always any military work or maritime city, to be conducted to the city of Philadelphia, and there to deliver to the Marshal of Pennsylvania, who will be apprized of their coming, all the British prisoner officers in your custody, whether heretofore confined or not, with the exception of the field officers, who I understood to be Colonel Grant, Major Villette, and Major Joseph Powell; to these you will offer the form of specific parole as hostages, sent you in my letter of the 29th of January; and, if accepted, take one from each, and assign them to some particular house and premises in the town of Cheshire; if not accepted, arrest either of them not so accepting, and send him on to Philadelphia with the other officers.

The officers I understand thus, under this order, to be sent on to Philadelphia or paroled, will be the seven returned in your list of the 14th instant.

Four returned in Major Melville's list of the 24th of December, confined at Lenox.

Nineteen returned in Major Melville's list of the 29th of January, as sent from Burlington.

Two naval officers, shown in your late returns, on parole, viz: Lieutenant Carpenter and one midshipman.

It is not meant, however, by this designation, to exclude any others of similar description I may have overlooked. Captain James S. Tyeth, intended to have been confined at Lenox with the other four, was reported by Major Melville to be in too bad a state of health to be in confinement; if he still remains so, he may remain at Cheshire on ordinary parole.

JOHN MASON.

J. PRINCE, Marshal, &c.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to John Smith, Esq., Marshal of Pennsylvania, dated

FEBRUARY 23, 1814.

SIR: The conduct of the enemy in confining many of our officers prisoners in their hands on the plea of retaliation for certain hostages designated and confined in the United States, to answer for the proper treatment and safety of a like number of American prisoner soldiers, separated from their fellow prisoners, and sent to England for trial, has imposed upon the Government the necessity of confining British officers in our power, equal in number, to be held responsible for every improper treatment of the enemy towards our officers.

I am commanded by the President to require that you will, immediately after the reception of this letter, suspend the paroles of, and place in close confinement, all the British commissioned officers of the army or navy, or midshipmen, or masters, or master's mates in the navy now in your custody within the State of Pennsylvania, not suffering from wounds or sickness, except Lieutenant Lovesay of the Jaseur, reported in yours of the 17th January, who happens to stand for the present in a peculiar situation: there are presumed to be three at Pittsburg, and a few at Lancaster, the number not precisely known; but be they more or less, this measure is to reach them all, except the Lieutenant before mentioned, as the numbers now within your State, in addition to those directed to be confined in other States, will not exceed that which is now required by the circumstances of the case.

You will, sir, so conduct the procedure on your part, that no knowledge of the intention of the Government on this subject shall be given until, at each place where there may be such officers in your State, the arrest is ready, under proper precautions to be made, and the persons of the British officers secured. In order that escapes may be effectually guarded against, those who may be at Pittsburg you will instruct your deputy to hold in confinement there; those at Lancaster, or any place not more distant, you will remove under a sufficient guard, in carriages, to Philadelphia, and confine them in that city.

So soon as the arrest takes place, the parole being suspended, the subsistence money is also suspended; and you will provide the officers in each case with comfortable plain fare, suitable to their ranks in life, for subsistence; and you will direct at Pittsburg, and provide in Philadelphia, in the places destined for their confinement, on the best terms you can, comfortable rooms, with stoves or fire-places, and such beds and furniture as will be convenient and proper, so as they may not be too crowded, to be conveniently subsisted; and you will allow to each field officer (if any) one servant to each, and to each four others one servant each; the servants to be taken from the prisoner soldiers, or paid by the officers; to be confined, however, in the walls of the jail, and to have no intercourse with without. You will allow to the officers the means, through proper channels, of sending out to procure anything of a proper nature for their use, and the use of books, pen, ink, and paper, &c.; but you will permit no person to see or converse with them but in the presence of yourself or one of your officers, and will allow no written paper or letters to pass to or from them, unless first inspected; and you will take particular care that nothing is introduced by them, or conveyed to them, that may facilitate escape.

You will, having thus taken every possible means to prevent escape, do all that may depend on you to make the situation of these unfortunate officers as comfortable as the nature of the case will admit, and treat them with as much tenderness and humanity as possible; and you are requested to explain to them the cause of their confinement, to inform them that the Government has reluctantly taken such steps, forced on it by the conduct of the enemy in regard to our officers held by them.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Feb. 28, 1814.

SIR: When I returned you, on the 26th of January, a list of British officers confined in Kentucky, because of the attempt to escape made by several of those who had been confined in Massachusetts, I was not able to ascertain, by any report I then had, with sufficient precision, the number and names of those held there. I have now the honor to enclose you a return of thirty-nine British officers, originally confined in retaliation, in part, for the forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers imprisoned in October last at Quebec; of these, four have effected their escape, as shown at foot, and four other British officers have been ordered into confinement to replace them; of the remaining thirty-five, twenty-four were confined in Kentucky, and eleven in Massachusetts, as pointed out in the list. You will be pleased to remark, that this list includes the one sent you on the 26th January, and contains, so far as that went, the same names.

At the time of the act of your Government at Quebec which produced this step of retaliation on our part, twenty-odd British officers had been, as I have before informed you, advanced to Burlington, towards the completion, on our part, of the engagement entered into with you last Fall. Desirous, under these circumstances, when it was made known that some of our officers remained uninterfered with at Quebec, by the rigid measures adopted by Sir George Prevost, that some of our prisoner soldiers also were yet there, over and above those shipped off to England or to Halifax, to leave the British officers so advanced on parole, (and in what was thought would be the most acceptable situation,) to be offered in exchange against the American officers then on parole at Quebec, it was determined, although the number designated at that time, in retaliation for the forty-six American officers confined at Quebec, was short of the numbers required here, and that the British officers sent to Burlington presented themselves as the most proper persons from whom to make the selection of the number yet requisite, in the spirit of conciliation, to save them untouched by the retaliatory system, until they should have been so offered in exchange. This having been done, with a full explanation to Sir George Prevost, and rejected by him, and it having been ascertained that both at Quebec and Halifax, a second series of American officers had been confined, amounting in number to at least forty-six, orders have been given in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, to confine an additional number of British officers, including those who had been sent to Burlington, in order to complete (with the deficit in the list now sent, against the forty-six arrested by your officers) the whole number of ninety-two, in the hope the authorities of your Government did not persist in holding in confinement with those first arrested to a greater amount.

On this subject I want information, and will thank you to inform me particularly what has been the course taken by your officers at Quebec and Halifax. I am advised by Colonel Gardner at Quebec, that, in the second step taken there in relation to our officers, ten were confined at Quebec. I am without any precise information whereby to be governed at this time.

By the letter from your agent for prisoners, of the 20th December, which you sent me, I find that all the American officers, military, naval, and of private maritime service, to the number of seventy-two, had been confined, and that it was intended to go on to arrest, to make up the number of ninety-two; that afterwards, so many of these as came over in the Anlostan, and Lieutenant Budd, were released. In another part of the same letter it is stated that forty-one American officers remained confined on board the ship Malabar. Mr. Mitchell, our agent at Halifax was so ill at his house in the country, where he had been confined for a considerable time, that in his short letters of the last of January, by the Bostock cartel, he merely refers to a general list sent him by Mr. Miller, of the prisoners at Halifax, by which I am at a loss to understand whether there were thirty-one or forty-seven American officers at that time in confinement at Halifax.

So soon as the returns, under the last orders for confinement of British officers in retaliation, for those long ago confined at Quebec and Halifax, are received, they shall be communicated to you.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,
J. MASON.

To Lieutenant DRAYTON.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 17, 1813.

SIR: You are authorized and instructed to address a letter to Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, representing the following facts and determination, viz: that a part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen were returning from Jamaica on parole as prisoners of war, and entering the Delaware, when Commodore Beresford caused them to be brought on board the Poictiers, and detained until a part of the crew of that ship, whom he demanded in exchange, were sent down from Philadelphia; that ultimately he detained John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, two of the aforesaid crew of the Vixen, on the plea of their being British subjects as appears by a letter from Commodore Beresford to Lieutenant Drayton, late first of the said brig Vixen; and that you are commanded explicitly to declare that, in retaliation for the violent and unjust detention of the said John Stevens and Thomas King, the Government of the United States will immediately cause four British subjects to be selected and held in duress, subject to the same treatment, in all respects, that the said John Stevens and Thomas King may receive during their detention.

On the receipt of the Admiral's answer, you will communicate the same to me without delay.

I am, respectfully, &c.

W. JONES.

CHARLES STEWART, Esq.,
Commanding naval officer, Norfolk Va.

U. S. FRIGATE CONSTELLATION,
OFF NORFOLK, May 20, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to represent to your Excellency that a part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen, returning from Jamaica on parole as prisoners of war, were, on entering the Delaware, taken out of the flag of truce by Commodore Beresford, commanding on that station, and detained until a part of the crew of the Poictiers, then prisoners at Philadelphia, were demanded by him and sent down in exchange; that ultimately he detained on board the Poictiers John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, late of the United States' brig Vixen, on plea of their being subjects of His Britannic Majesty.

This violation of the rights of prisoners on parole is so contrary to the usage of civilized nations, that I trust your Excellency will give such instructions upon that head as will prevent a similar violation in future.

I have it in command from my Government to state to your Excellency, that, in retaliation for so violent and unjust a procedure on the part of Commodore Beresford, in detaining the above Mr. John Stevens and Thomas King, four subjects of His Britannic Majesty will be immediately selected and held in durance, subject to the same treatment, in all respects, which may be shown towards the aforesaid two persons during their detention. I hope your Excellency will give this subject your earliest attention, and direct the release of Mr. Stevens and Thomas King, who have been so improperly detained on board the Poictiers.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES STEWART,
Commanding officer of the U. S. naval forces at Norfolk.

Rt. Hon. SIR JOHN WARREN,
Admiral of the Blue, &c.

H. B. M. SHIP MARLBOROUGH,
IN LYNNHAVEN BAY, May 21, 1813.

SIR: In the absence of Sir John Warren, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter under date of the 20th current, complaining of the conduct of Commodore Beresford towards some American prisoners of war returning to Philadelphia on parole, and of his having detained on board the Poictiers Mr. John Stevens and Thomas King.

No report of these circumstances has yet reached Sir John Warren or myself from Commodore Beresford, but I have no hesitation in assuring you, sir, that every inquiry would have been made into them, and every satisfaction and explanation thereon, which the case might have required, would have been offered to your Government and myself, with the least possible delay, had it not been for the threat with which your representation on this subject is accompanied; the tenor of which being likely to produce an entire change in the aspect of our communications, and particularly in what relates to individuals whom the fate of war has placed within the power of our respective nations, it totally precludes the possibility of my now entering further into the subject than to assure you your letter shall be transmitted to the right honorable the Commander-in-chief by the earliest opportunity; and whenever his answer arrives, it shall be forwarded to you without delay. I have the the honor to be, &c.

G. COCKBURN.

CAPTAIN STEWART, &c.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,

SIR: The President has ordered that four British subjects be designated as hostages for the safety of John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, late of the United States' brig Vixen, prisoners of war, and returning on parole from Jamaica, violently detained, in the beginning of this month, when entering the Delaware, by Commodore Beresford, on the plea of their being British subjects.

You will, immediately on reception of this letter, select, by lot, from among the British prisoners of war in your custody, and belonging to King's ships, (taking special care to avoid the ten men of the Guerriere's crew lately released by you,) four men, two carpenters, or of the rank of carpenter as near as may be, and two seamen; place them in duress, and hold them in close confinement, subject, by future orders, to the same treatment, in all respects, that the said John Stevens and Thomas King may receive during their detention.

So soon as you have made the selection, you are required, by an early communication, to give me the names and description of the hostages, and of their place of confinement.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES PRINCE, Esq.,
Marshal of Massachusetts.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON June, 10, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the copy of a letter from Captain Stewart, commanding the United States' naval forces at Norfolk, dated the 20th of May, to Admiral Warren, and that of a letter from Rear Admiral Cockburn, dated 21st of May, in reply, relative to a most unjustifiable act of Commodore Beresford, as to part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen, at the mouth of the Delaware. Leaving the general question of the interference of Commodore Beresford with these prisoners of war returning on parole, and the exaction made by him in consequence of the irregular power thus assumed, on the ground on which Captain Stewart has very properly placed it, I will remark that Captain Stewart was certainly misapprehended by Admiral Cockburn, in attributing to him the intention of conveying a threat as to the final detention of two of the American prisoners. On the contrary, the expression used by Captain Stewart communicates, in very plain terms, the decision of this Government, then already made, that four of His Britannic Majesty's subjects should be immediately selected and held in duress, subject to the same treatment, in all respects, &c. And I have now to inform you, sir, that, in virtue of this decision, and by an order from this office, the Marshal of Massachusetts has designated, and placed in close confinement, William Kitto, carpenter, and Henry Beddingfield, boatswain, of the late British packet Swallow, and John Squirrel and James Russell, seamen, of the Dragon 74, subjects of His Britannic Majesty, to be held responsible for the safety of John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, part of the crew of the late United States' brig Vixen.

I flatter myself, sir, that this subject will command your early attention, and that you will cause the officer and seaman of the Vixen to be immediately released and returned to this country, according to their destination when taken from the cartel. I have the honor to be, &c.

Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

JUNE 15, 1813.

The subject of your letter of the 10th (the detention of King and Stevens by Commodore Beresford) is a matter not committed to me by my Government. It is of the first consequence, and on which the two nations have long entertained very different opinions. Although in ordinary cases of American prisoners of war arriving from British ports to these States, wherein either the whole or a part of them may have been detained by the commander of one of His Majesty's ships of war, it would be my duty to request information why the prisoners were detained, still, in the present instance, as your letter to me, and Captain Stewart's letter to his Excellency Sir John Borlase Warren, whereof you have sent me a copy, develop the cause of detention, I cannot interfere without going into the merits; in doing which either Admiral Sir John B. Warren or Commodore Beresford might with propriety question my authority.

AUGUST 25, 1813.

I have the honor to inform you that I yesterday directed the Marshal of Massachusetts to restore to the ordinary state of prisoners John Squirrel and James Russell, seamen, late of the British 74 gun ship Dragon, held, as I informed you in my letter of the 18th of June, to answer for the safety and proper treatment in the hands of the enemy of Thomas King, seaman, of the United States' late brig Vixen. King having lately made his escape from confinement in Bermuda, and, at the imminent risk of his life, arrived alone in an open boat on our coast, and reported himself to his officers, although he was not released, it has been determined, for the sake of humanity, not to regard the manner in which he has been restored to his country, and to relieve at once from anxiety and rigid confinement the two British seamen so held on his account.

NAVY YARD, CHARLESTOWN,

June 3, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose to you a deposition respecting the inhuman treatment which Mr. Nichols, late commander of the private armed ship Decatur, belonging to Newburyport, has received from the British Government at Barbadoes. I have been credibly informed that Captain Nichols is a very respectable and correct man; therefore, a fair presumption that he has not committed himself in such a manner as ought to deprive him of the established rights of a prisoner of war. Any measure which the Government of our country may see proper to adopt in consequence of this determination, I shall readily attend to. I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. BAINBRIDGE.

Hon. WILLIAM JONES, Sec'y Navy.

I, James Foot, of Newburyport, in the county of Essex and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, mariner, testify and depose that I was a prize-master on board the private armed brigantine Decatur, of Newburyport, in her late cruise, William Nichols, commander; that, on the 18th day of January now last past, the said brigantine was captured by His Britannic Majesty's frigate Surprise, commanded by Captain Cochrane, and carried into Barbadoes. After our arrival in Barbadoes, Captain Nichols, with the other officers of the Decatur, were paroled. About two months after our arrival, His Britannic Majesty's frigate Vesta arrived in Barbadoes, and, through the influence of the commander of the Vesta, Captain Nichols, without any known or pretended cause, was arrested and held in close confinement, without liberty to speak to any of his officers, or any other American. The place where Captain Nichols was confined was about four feet in width, and seven feet in length, on board a prison ship, where he remained for thirty-four days, as nearly as I can recollect, and was then taken on board His Majesty's ship Tribune, and carried to England. What the cause of the unwarrantable and unjustifiable conduct of the enemy towards Captain Nichols was, I am unable to state. There were several reports in circulation; one was, that he was to be carried to England and held a prisoner until the release of certain men in France from whom Captain Nichols recaptured his vessel, which had been taken by the British before the commencement of the present war between the two countries. Another report was, that he was to be held until the close of the war, on account of his having been active against the enemy since the commencement of hostilities, and having been fortunate in a former cruise.

JAMES FOOT.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,

ESSEX, ss:

On this thirty-first day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, personally appeared James Foot, the subscriber to the foregoing deposition, and made solemn oath that the same is true.

JACOB GERRISH, J. P.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, June 21, 1813.

SIR: Immediately on reception of this letter, you are requested and instructed, by command of the President, to designate two masters of private armed ships, or of merchantmen, British subjects, and prisoners of war, the first in preference, if you or the Marshal of Maine have such in your charge, to place them in close confinement, and to hold them for further orders from this office, to answer for the safety and proper treatment of Captain William Nichols, late master of the private armed brigantine Decatur, of Newburyport, who was, when a prisoner, paroled at Barbadoes last Spring, unjustifiably and inhumanly confined on board a prison-ship at that place for more than a month, and then sent to England, in similar confinement, aboard one of the enemy's armed ships.

I shall write to the Marshal of Maine, and request him, if necessary, to act in conjunction with you on the subject.

You will be pleased to communicate this letter to Commodore Bainbridge, who has been good enough to interest himself in this matter of national feeling and justice, and to concert with him the proper measures; and, so soon as the order is executed, to give me the names, description, and places of confinement of the two persons designated. If there be more than two of the proper character from whom to designate, the designation should be made by lot.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MASON.

JAMES PRINCE, Esq.,
Marshal of Massachusetts.

JULY 3, 1813.

I beg leave to assure you that I shall at all times consider it my duty to give you the earliest information in my power of the detention or confinement of any of the officers of the United States' Army and Navy, private armed vessels or merchantmen, with the reasons, as far as comes to my knowledge. I hope to receive the same treatment from you in similar cases.

The New York Gazette of this day states, under the Portland head, that Joseph Barss, captain of the late British privateer schooner Liverpool Packet, had been ordered into close confinement in Portland, on the 28th ultimo, by order of your Government, and it is said as retaliatory for the treatment by the British of Captain Nichols, of the Decatur, of Newburyport.

I request you will communicate to me such facts as you can reveal consistent with your duty on this subject.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Colonel Thomas Barclay.

JULY 8, 1813.

On the 21st of June I gave directions to the Marshal of Massachusetts to execute a retaliatory order from this Government, (which, I presume, is the one to which you allude in your letter of the 3d instant,) with intention, as soon as his return was received, to give you information thereof, as was done on a late occasion of a similar kind. That return has not yet been received; so soon as it is, you may be assured that you shall hear from me on the subject.

JULY 27, 1813.

On the 3d instant I informed you the New York Gazette stated that Captain Joseph Barss, of the Liverpool Packet privateer, a British prisoner of war, on parole in Massachusetts, had been, by order of this Government, put in prison, retaliatory for treatment which Captain Nichols, of the American privateer Decatur, received in some part of His Majesty's dominions; and as I was totally ignorant of the cause, either of Captain Nichols's confinement or of Captain Barss's imprisonment, save what the Gazette expressed, I requested you to communicate to me such facts as were consistent with your duty to reveal.

On the 8th of this month I received your answer, in the words following: "On the 21st of June I gave directions to the Marshal of Massachusetts to execute a retaliatory order from this Government, (which, I presume, is the one to which you allude in your letter of the 3d instant,) with intention, as soon as his return was received, to give you information thereof. That return has not yet been received; as soon as it is, you may be assured that you shall hear from me on the subject."

I have not since heard further from you on this subject. On inquiry, I learn the following particulars respecting Captain Nichols: Previous to the present war between Great Britain and the United States, Captain Nichols commanded the American brig Alert, and, on his voyage to France, was detained by a British ship of war, and an officer and men put on board the Alert, with orders to carry her into a British port for adjudication; that, soon after, Captain Nichols and the men of the Alert rose on the British officer and seamen, regained the command of the Alert, and compelled the officer and British seamen to go into a small boat of the Alert, and turned them adrift at sea. Captain Nichols then pursued his voyage to France; before he made the land, he was, however, again met by the same British ship of war, and not being able or willing to give a correct account of the officer and men originally put on board his brig, he was sent to England as a prisoner for trial, under the suspicion of his having murdered, or otherwise made away with them; previous to his trial he effected his escape. A proclamation was issued for his being apprehended and lodged in any of His Majesty's jails. Captain Nichols, at the commencement of the present war, was commander of the Decatur, American privateer, captured and sent into Barbadoes, where he was paroled. His Majesty's ship Vesta, by which the Alert brig had been originally detained, arrived at Barbadoes some time in January last; the commander of which immediately recognised Captain Nichols, had him arrested, and sent to England, in the Tribune frigate, for trial. A partial account, I understand, has been published in the Newburyport newspaper, in June last, of Captain Nichols's arrest and imprisonment at Barbadoes, and being sent to England.

I have to request you will acquaint me whether the statement I have given you is correct; if not, that you will be pleased to furnish me with the facts you are possessed of. More than a sufficient period has elapsed for the Marshal of Massachusetts to send you his return; if I suffer Captain Barss (and Captain Woodworth, who I also learn, is confined on the same principle) to remain in jail, without attempting their release, I shall, with justice, stand charged with neglect of duty.

HARLEM, August 7, 1813.

On the 27th day of July, nineteen days after the date of your letter to me, not having received the promised information, I again addressed you on the subject of Captain Barss and a Captain Woodworth, who, in the interval above-mentioned, I discovered was also a close prisoner for the same cause; and, at the same time, gave you the merits of Captain Nichols's case, his arrest, and being sent to England for trial. The detail, I informed you, was the best I had been able to obtain, and requested you to acquaint me whether it was correct; if not, that you would be pleased to possess me with the facts in your possession. I have waited some time in the hope of receiving your answer. From your silence I am under the necessity of taking up the statement I transmitted to you as correct. If it is not, I feel it my duty to say you should long since have given me a true case. If, therefore, the subsequent remarks are founded on false premises, you will have the goodness to attribute them to your silence and delay.

I beg leave to submit the following remarks, which, as they are founded on general principles, I flatter myself will meet your and the President's concurrence:

Prisoners of war, guilty of crimes, are objects for trial and punishment by the nation to which they are prisoners; and the nation to which such prisoners belong has no right to object to the trial or punishments, provided they are agreeable to the laws of the land in which such prisoner may be, or consonant to the laws of nations.

When the citizen or subject of one nation is a prisoner, if the nation to which he is a prisoner treats him with unaccustomed severity, or in any other manner supposed to be illegal, it is the duty of the Government to whom he belongs to ascertain the facts, require an explanation, and, when possessed of all the circumstances, to acquiesce in the treatment, or remonstrate against it; and eventually, if justice is not done, or satisfaction made, to retaliate. One nation has not the right to retaliate on the subjects of another, without first demanding the above explanation. War, of itself, even under the present control of civilization, is sufficiently barbarous, without going this last step, which I have reason to fear is the intention of this Government, to retaliate on British prisoners, whatever Americans may receive from the British Government, even in cases where the American prisoners have been guilty of crimes. It appears, from the statement transmitted to you, that Captain Nichols, prior to the war, was committed to jail in England for some offence. Whether he was innocent or guilty is immaterial; at that time the same law would have been measured to him in common with His Majesty's subjects, and he was bound to have submitted thereto. Captain Nichols, however, thought proper to avoid a trial, and made his escape from prison. The British Government issued a proclamation for apprehending him; he, however, escaped, and returned to these States.

On the declaration of war he was appointed commander of the Decatur privateer, and, in January last, was captured by His Majesty's ship Surprise, and sent to Barbadoes, where he was paroled, and had the liberty to walk the streets. Soon after the Vesta frigate arrived at Barbadoes, the commander of which recognised Captain Nichols, knew the crime he had committed before the war, when Captain of the Alert merchant vessel, his escape, and the proclamation for apprehending him. He, therefore, had him arrested, and he has since been sent to England for his trial.

You will at once perceive that Captain Nichols was not arrested or sent to England for any act committed by him since, but for an offence prior to the war, when the two nations were at amity, and when he was as amenable to the laws of England as any of His Majesty's subjects.

His acquittal or punishment will be by a due course of law, and not by a naval or military tribunal; and I trust it is scarce necessary for me to add, that the judgment will be conformable to law and justice. Captain Nichols cannot acquire any rights from the war, or in consequence of being a prisoner, which will protect him for offences committed prior to the war.

I confidently hope the preceding relation and remarks will prove satisfactory, and that an order may be immediately forwarded for the release of Captains Barss and Woodworth. I pray your early answer.

With much more propriety might His Majesty retaliate for the detention and close confinement of Mr. Bowie, in Massachusetts, who is accused of attempting to convey letters to Halifax during war, than this Government attempt to prevent, by retaliatory measures, the ordinary effects of British courts of law on Captain Nichols, charged with crimes committed during a state of profound peace.

I trust retaliatory measures will not in future be used by this Government, save on the fair principles expressed in this letter; if they are, the inevitable consequence will be, that similar measures must be adopted on the part of His Majesty.

August 25, 1813.

I beg leave to assure you that it was not my intention to delay unnecessarily the replies to your inquiries, relative to the confinement of Captain Barss and Captain Woodworth; I am ready to confess that this delay has arisen from an accident which I shall explain, and which retarded, longer than was desirable, my communication.

I should have more regretted this circumstance, but from the tenor of your letter of the 15th of June, in reply to mine of the 10th, on a similar subject, in which you consider yourself not the proper person to be addressed on occasions of this nature; yet it is proper to state, that retaliatory orders do not originate with me; they come from higher authority, and this office is only made the medium of their execution, with instructions, in each case, to give to you, when the order is executed, information of the fact. In the present case, the order from this office, as I informed you in mine of the 8th of July, was issued on the 21st of June to the Marshal of Massachusetts, to designate two masters of private armed ships, or of merchantmen, British subjects, and prisoners of war, in charge of himself, or of either of the Marshals of New Hampshire or Maine, and place them in close confinement, to be held to answer for the safety and proper treatment of Captain William Nichols, late master of the private armed brigantine Decatur, of Newburyport, who, while a prisoner of war on parole at Barbadoes, during last Spring, had been seized and inhumanly confined in a small hole on board a prison-ship at that place, and barred from all communication for more than a month, and then sent to England, in close confinement, on board one of the enemy's ships, for no offence, alleged or known, other than that he was accused, by some of the British officers, of having recaptured an American vessel under his command, taken from him by a British armed vessel before the war; and the Marshal was directed to make return.

It appears that the order was regularly executed, and the two Captains (Barss and Woodworth) designated and confined. The Marshal of Massachusetts, although an excellent and accurate officer, had omitted to make a regular return; probably the omission was owing to the designation having been made without his own district. I waited for his return when I wrote you on the 8th of this month, as I then informed you; for certainly it was my intention to have communicated the facts and the causes as I have now done, without any inquiry on your part, as I had done in the case of the four men confined in retaliation for the two seized by Commodore Beresford, and notwithstanding the manner in which you received that communication.

In reply to your letters of the 27th July, and 7th of August, I will first beg leave to decline the discussion on which you are pleased to enter, as to the nature and rights of retaliation in time of war; and will only remark that, on this point, I have no authority to enter on that subject generally with you. On the merits of any particular case, where prisoners of war are concerned, I am authorized, and consider it my duty, to endeavor, by explanation and a statement of facts, to divert severity on either side as much as possible. It is difficult to reconcile the following passage in your letter of the 15th June; "It does not, therefore, appear to be the duties of my office to interfere, where it is suggested the officers of His Majesty's navy or army have acted, either contrary to law or even indiscreetly; such cases are to be arranged by the Commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships of war on the American station, or by the General commanding His Majesty's forces in America, or by His Majesty's Ministers in London." With the wide field you have taken in your letter of the 7th of August, relative to the cases of Captains Nichols, Barss, and Woodworth, it is not easy to suppose that your Government should expect that you could exercise here the full power of requiring explanation from the American authorities, without offering to them the means of similar facility.

You have, however, given what you suppose, as you say, to be the circumstances of Captain Nichols's case. As you rest it on no authority, you must permit me to say, it is impossible for me to act in any way on your present statement. Without, however, implying any commitment on the part of this Government as to its future course, I will only remind you that you have more than once been mistaken on information collected from irregular sources. I will cite the cases of Mr. Oswald Lawson, &c., as evidences of the caution with which you ought to make official demands. All authentic information which you may be able to collect respecting the case of Captain Nichols, shall be received with pleasure, and, I can assure you, will command the immediate attention of the proper authorities. In the meantime it is proper to state, that his character has been inquired into, and is considered too respectable to be reached by the accusation of crimes you are pleased, on rumor only, to bring against him.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Thomas Barclay to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated.

AUGUST 29, 1813.

I am honored with your letter of the 25th instant, on the subject of Captains Barss and Woodworth, British prisoners of war, now in close confinement in these States, as a retaliatory measure for treatment stated to have been received by Captain Nichols, of the Decatur privateer, while a prisoner, and his having since been sent to England as a prisoner.

From the tenor of your letter, it is evident you suppose my letters to you on the above subject are in opposition to my letter of the 15th of June, in answer to yours of the 10th of that month, respecting two men of the Vixen, taken out of a cartel vessel in the Delaware, by Commodore Beresford. I am unable to discover any contradiction in them. In your letter of the 10th June, after stating the facts, you request me to "cause the officer and seaman of the Vixen to be immediately released and returned to this country." In answer, I informed you this was not in my power; that "the duties of my office were confined to the relief of British subjects detained in the United States of America, and for carrying on exchanges;" and I added, that which you notice in your letter of the 25th instant, "it does not, therefore, appertain to the duties of my office," &c.; this was a natural and correct conclusion, after stating the nature and extent of my appointment. The case in which you called on me to interfere was of the first importance; it embraced the causes on which the United States have founded the necessity of going to war with Great Britain; it involved the right exercised by Great Britain over her subjects; and, on the other hand, the right the United States claim with respect to British born subjects, made citizens in these States. I therefore told you it was beyond the limits of my appointment, and could only be acted upon by the Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's ships of war in America, or His Majesty's Ministers in London; and I acquainted you I should transmit to his Excellency Sir John B. Warren, and to my Government, copies of your communication on this subject, which was done. I cannot perceive in what manner this acknowledged want of power in me can lead you to imagine it deprives me of the right of respectfully inquiring of this Government the reasons which have induced it to deprive of the benefit of parole, and treat with increased severity, two British prisoners of war, not charged with having committed a crime or an offence. The words of my commission particularly embrace the case of Captains Barss and Woodworth, who are detained in these States.

I proceed to the second part of your letter—the reasons assigned by you for not having returned me an answer to my letters on this subject. This, you observe, was occasioned by the marshal's not having transmitted you a regular return. The return of the marshal was wholly irrelevant to the request contained in my letters of the 3d and 27th July. I made no inquiry respecting the conduct of the marshal in executing the order of the Government on Captains Barss and Woodworth. I was possessed of this fact. What I requested was, that you would be pleased to "communicate to me such facts as you can reveal consistent with your duty." This Government must have been possessed of them before the 3d of July, nay, even prior to the order to the marshal to apprehend two British prisoners; consequently, it was equally in your power on the 8th of July, as on the 25th of August, to have offered me the information requested.

My letter of the 27th of July contains simply the circumstances I had collected respecting Captain Nichols; the cause of his parole at Barbadoes being superseded, and he sent on board the prison-ship, and from thence to England; together with the request that you would acquaint me whether those facts were correct, and, if not, that you would be pleased to furnish me the facts in your possession. It is true, on the 7th of August, in consequence of your continued silence, and withholding from me the information I had repeatedly requested, I entered upon the propriety of the treatment of Captains Barss and Woodworth, and argued upon it, taking the case sent you on the 27th of July, as comprising the whole of the facts relating to Captain Nichols, and Captains Barss and Woodworth. Prior, however, to my entering upon the subject, I recapitulated my repeated attempts to obtain information from you, and added that "from your silence I am compelled to take up the statement I transmitted to you as correct; if it is not, I feel it my duty to say should long since have given me a true case."

I beg leave to assure you, sir, that the principles stated by me in my letter of the 7th August, respecting retaliatory measures, were by no means intended as matter of discussion. I consider them as acknowledged principles, and, as such, applied them to the case. I will not presume to say they were apposite to the case under consideration—that is a question to be determined by others—but I aver the principles to be sound law.

The case of Captain Nichols, as represented by me, is generally, though not particularly, acknowledged by you, in your letter of the 25th instant, in which you suggest that Captains Barss and Woodworth were placed "in close confinement, to be held to answer for the safety and proper treatment of Captain William Nichols, late master of the private armed brig Decatur, of Newburyport, who, while a prisoner of war on parole at Barbadoes, during the last Spring, had been seized and inhumanly confined in a small hole on board a prison-ship at that place, and barred from all communication for more than a month, and then sent to England in close confinement on board of one of the enemy's ships, for no offence alleged or known, other than that he was accused by some of the British officers of having recaptured an American vessel under his command, and taken from him by a British armed vessel before the war." In the preceding extract, you acknowledge that Captain Nichols "was accused by some British officers of having recaptured an American vessel under his command before the war." This forms a part of my statement to you on the 27th of July. In addition to which, I mentioned what is omitted by you, but which will eventually come out in evidence, that Captain Nichols, on regaining the possession of the Alert brig, put the prize-master and seamen in a small boat, and committed them to the mercy of the winds and waves. It is for this act, principally, he is sent to England to be tried. In a case like the present, I presume that this Government would not have directed retaliatory orders to issue, without having the facts confirmed under an oath; and I had hoped you would have had the goodness to have sent me copies of the depositions taken. If you can with propriety do it, you will oblige me by sending them. In my letter of yesterday, I informed you I had the depositions of two of the men of the Decatur privateer, who were prisoners with Captain Nichols on board the prison-ship, who swear that he was not "inhumanly confined in a small hole on board the prison-ship," but that he had a state-room in the ship, with the use of the cabin and quarter-deck, and that they never heard either Captain Nichols or any other person complain of the treatment Captain Nichols received. These depositions were taken before a notary public and justice of the peace.

I am greatly at a loss to account for your having introduced into your letter of the 25th instant Oswald Lawson's, and three other cases, in evidence of my having (as you are pleased to say) been mistaken in information collected from irregular sources; by this means, hinting that my representation respecting Captain Nichols appertained to the same class. I have evidently shown that this is not so, and that you and myself agree in the leading point—that Captain Nichols is accused, by one or more of His Majesty's officers, of a criminal act before the war. But, admitting that no one part of my statement was correct, had I not expressly remarked, I am compelled, by your withholding all information from me on the subject, to suppose from your silence it contained the truth.

BOSTON, September 3, 1813.

SIR: In answer to your inquiries, respecting Captain William Nichols, I have to state that, in the year eighteen hundred and eleven, and I think in the month of August, Captain Nichols was master of my brig Alert, belonging to Newburyport, engaged on a voyage to Bordeaux; that, two or three days after sailing from that port, on his return home, he was taken by the frigate, having a cargo of wines, brandies, silks, and nothing which could possibly be construed as contraband of war; and his vessel was (after a prize-master and six men were put on board) ordered for England; he and his mate only, with two small boys, being permitted to remain. About three days after, he and the mate rose on the crew, tied their hands behind them, and hoisted out the long boat, being only about forty miles from the land, (and summer time,) rigged her, placed on the sails and oars, put in her two barrels of bread, plenty of beef, two casks of water, a keg of wine, keg of brandy, other small stores, all their clothes, and such conveniences as would be necessary; supplied them with a good compass and quadrant, and then put the six men in the boat, in which they proceeded to, and safely landed in France. Captain Nichols and the mate then called on deck the two small boys, who had remained below during these transactions, and proceeded on his voyage; but six days after, he was again captured by the English frigate Vesta, to whom he related the foregoing circumstances, and the captain and officers of this frigate did not treat him as though they thought his conduct either criminal or reprehensible; he was carried with his vessel to Portsmouth, in England, and after being on board the frigate in harbor a few days, he came on shore, went up to London, thence proceeded to Liverpool, and there took passage and returned to Newburyport.

A short time after I gave him the command of another of my vessels, namely, the brig Dolphin, a new vessel, then lying at Newburyport, and he proceeded on his voyage, laden with fish, for Bordeaux; but on his passage out, being at sea thirteen days, he was taken by a British frigate in company with a sloop of war. The captain of the frigate asked Captain Nichols if he was the person who retook the Alert? Captain Nichols replied in the affirmative; the British captain replied "it was a brave act, and he should treat him as a brave man deserved;" and after experiencing the best of treatment while at sea, this officer delivered, on his arrival to Captain Nichols, all his private adventure, the proceeds of which passed through my hands from my correspondent in England; and Captain Nichols was not restrained on his arrival in England, but was suffered to be at large, and come home passenger in the ship Aurora, by the way of New York, about six weeks prior to the declaration of war between this country and England.

Directly on the declaration of war I purchased (with my friends) the brig Decatur, and Captain Nichols was selected as a suitable character to take the command; and he proceeded on a cruise against the British, took eleven prizes, and returned into port; the Decatur was refitted, proceeded on a second cruise, during which he was taken by the Surprise frigate, and carried into Barbadoes, and there paroled for nearly two months, when, the Vesta frigate arriving at that island, he was arrested, sent on board the prison ship, placed in close confinement in a room built purposely for him, of five feet broad and seven feet wide, and no person allowed but his keeper to speak to him. After remaining in this unpleasant situation nearly six weeks, he was sent on board the British frigate Tribune, and ordered for England, since when we have not heard from him.

Touching the character of Captain Nichols, as a man, and a neighbor, he is modest and unassuming, yet brave and decided; warmly attached to the constitutions, Federal and State, of his native country; eager to resist and cool to defend those rights for which the independence of his country was established, and which no unjust pretensions of the enemy will lead him to submit to, however great his personal sufferings. As a man, he is strictly moral and sincere; as a husband, parent, and neighbor, tender, indulgent, and affable. His connexions are highly respectable, and are among the first of our citizens. Universal assent among all classes and parties may be had that Captain Nichols is truly an honest, brave, and useful citizen.

I hope this information will be the means of restoring him to his family, his friends, and his country, and I can myself vouch for the correctness of the statement.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN PIERCE.

JAMES PRINCE, Marshal of Mass.

OCTOBER 5, 1813.

In your letters of the 26th and 29th of August, you request me to inform you of the determination of Government as to the British Captains Barss and Woodworth. You state that Captain Nichols, of the American privateer Decatur, was sent to England for an offence he stands charged with prior to the war, to wit, having recaptured his vessel, and put part of the prize crew in a boat at sea; request me to send you any affidavits or other evidence in the case; and inform me that you are in possession of the depositions of two of the seamen of the privateer Decatur, contradicting statements you have seen relative to the treatment of Captain Nichols. I send you, sir, as you request—although, in the present stage of this business, and on your own declarations, I might be very well excused from further explanations on the subject—the copy of an affidavit by Mr. James Foote, prize-master, on board the Decatur at the time Captain Nichols was last taken, and present at Barbadoes with him when he was seized and confined; and of a letter from Commodore Bainbridge of the 3d of June, which communicated it; as also of the narrative of Benjamin Pierce, Esq., owner, not only of the privateer in which Captain Nichols was last captured, but of the vessel in which he was taken before the war, of all the circumstances of the whole case with which he must, from his relation with Captain Nichols, have been necessarily intimately acquainted. The character and standing of Mr. Pierce precludes all doubt as to the veracity of his account. By it, it will appear that Captain Nichols was never prosecuted in England before the war, as you have been pleased to state, for any act; on the contrary, that he was captured a second time and carried to that country without molestation; that the commanders of your frigates, who made a prize of him, brought no charge against him before the war; and that, as to his treatment of the English crew, from whom he so bravely recovered his vessel, he did all that could have been expected for them, in the unjustifiable situation in which he had been placed: he supplied them abundantly in a good boat, on a smooth sea, in sight of the French coast, on which they safely landed. You lay much stress on the offence you are pleased to impute to Captain Nichols, committed as you say in time of peace, namely, the retaking his vessel. You compel me, unwillingly, sir, to remind you that the period to which you allude was a time of peace only on one side; it was, "on the side of Great Britain, a state of war against the United States; on the side of the United States, a state of peace towards Great Britain." Captain Nichols thus had war made on him while peaceably pursuing a lawful commerce. He was justified, by the laws of God and man, to retort the war, so far as to free himself and his property, as soon as he had it in his power to do so.

You will please to remark, sir, that the narrative of Mr. Pierce was received after the retaliation tory measures were taken in this case, and is now used only to rebut the statements you have made, or alleged, of former prosecution and escape of Captain Nichols. It was not necessary to assure the Government of the facts on which it proceeded, nor were they rested only on the affidavit of Mr. Foote, respectable as it is. All that he has stated was previously confirmed to me by declarations, made in person, by several officers of American vessels, who were on the spot, prisoners at the time in Barbadoes; and the affidavits of the two sailors notwithstanding, which you say you have become possessed of, you will find them, in the result, prove correct. In reply to your inquiry as to the determination of the Government relative to Captains Barss and Woodworth, I have to inform you that it is firmly now as it was originally taken, to hold them as hostages, to answer in their persons for the safety and proper treatment of Captain Nichols in the hands of the enemy.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Thomas Barclay, General Agent for British Prisoners, to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated at

HARLEM, January 24, 1814.

I have the honor to enclose you a copy of a letter received from the Commissioners for conducting His Majesty's transport service, and for the care and custody of prisoners of war; from which you will perceive that Captain Nichols, of the Decatur privateer, is not detained in prison for any particular offence alleged against him, but that he is held at Chatham a prisoner, because the privateer which he commanded was not of a sufficient size to entitle him to parole. The Commissioners further state that they had communicated this circumstance to Mr. Beasley, your agent in London, who, I take for granted, has acquainted you with the nature of the confinement in which Captain Nichols is in at Chatham. I request that you will order the Marshal, under whose custody Captain Barss is at present, to release him from the strict confinement in which he is at present, and that he may be placed in a situation similar to that in which Captain Nichols now is; also, that you will be pleased to release Captain Woodworth on parole, as he was prior to his being put into close confinement. I have named the two British captains, not by way of selection on my part, because, had their situations been the same, I should have left it to you to release which of the two you thought proper; but under an impression that Woodworth, who is, I believe, a Quaker, was master of an unarmed merchant vessel, and, therefore, entitled to his parole, from masters of merchant vessels being paroled throughout His Majesty's dominions.

If Captain Barss was captured in a privateer of fourteen guns, he also should be paroled. I am, however, apprehensive that the vessel he commanded did not carry so many guns. I will inquire into the fact.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, Nov. 5, 1813.

SIR: Admiral Griffith having communicated to us your letters of the 14th of July, addressed to Admiral Sir J. B. Warren, with its enclosures, relative to the severities practised by the American Government towards British prisoners of war, in consequence of the confinement of Captain Nichols, of the American privateer Decatur, we acquaint you that Mr. Nichols, who is now at Chatham, is not confined because he put the boat adrift, but simply because the privateer which he commanded was not of a sufficient size to entitle him to parole, of which circumstance Mr. Beasley has been informed in answer to an application made by him for Mr. Nichols to be admitted to parole.

We are, sir, your humble servants.

RUPERT GEORGE,
J. BOWEN,
JOHN FORBES.

THOMAS BARCLAY, Esq.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Feb. 14, 1814.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of 24th January, transmitting one addressed to you on the 5th November, by the Commissioners of the British Transport Board, by which I am informed that Captain Nichols, of the American privateer Decatur, is not detained now in prison for any particular offence alleged against him, but that he is confined simply because the privateer he commanded was not of sufficient force to entitle him to parole. This is, to be sure, taking a very different ground from that on which you strenuously, in July and August, insisted. Capt. Nichols was to be tried for his life for crimes committed in times of profound peace; yet if Captain Nichols is refused his parole, and held in close confinement, on the mere pretext that he did not command a privateer of as many as fourteen guns, it ought to have been explained why he was treated like a criminal at Barbadoes, separated from his fellow prisoners, with whom he would have been long since released, and transported to England in so ignominious a manner; and it would have been but small atonement, on the part of your Government to this injured man, for the extreme severity used towards him by its officers, so soon as they had ascertained, which is now admitted, that he had been unjustly accused, to have released him on parole.

As, however, it is now declared that there is no intention of bringing him to trial, orders have been given to restore, to the ordinary state of prisoners of war, the British Captains Woodworth and Barss who had been designated as hostages to be held for his safety; the first to be restored to his parole, and the last to remain in confinement, where he will be retained for special exchange against Captain Nichols.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

BLADENSBURG, March 13, 1814.

SIR: I consider it a circumstance to be lamented that Captains Barss and Nichols should remain prisoners in close confinement, both being respectable characters; if, therefore, it meets your wishes, I am ready to write to the Commissioners in London to exchange Captain Nichols for Captain Barss without delay, and request them to restore him, on the receipt of my letter, to liberty, and allow him to return in the first conveyance, public or private, to America. In return, I shall expect Captain Barss to be admitted to his parole, and, on the arrival of Captain Nichols in these States, to be immediately exchanged; or, on receiving a letter from the Commissioners expressive of their assent to these exchanges, that Captain Barss shall be permitted to return to Nova Scotia on parole in the first conveyance.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, March 22, 1814.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 13th instant, I readily consent to your proposition that the exchange of Captain Barss against Captain Nichols take place; Captain Barss being specially held for that purpose, as I had the honor to inform you in my letter of the 14th ultimo.

So soon as you shall announce to me that Captain Nichols is paroled, a similar indulgence shall be extended to Captain Barss; and whenever you may have it in your power to inform me that Captain Nichols is embarked, with permission to return to the United States for the purpose of his exchange, Captain Barss shall be immediately permitted to go on parole to Nova Scotia. SIR: I have, by this morning's mail, received your letter of the 22d instant, in answer to mine of the 13th, respecting Captains Barss and Nichols, and agreeing to my propositions. Anxious for their release and exchange, I delayed not a moment to write to the Commissioners on the subject, and enclosed them a copy of your letter, and requested their immediate answer.

I have the honor to enclose my letter to them to you, and request you will forward it by tomorrow's mail to the Marshal of New York, to be put in the letter bag of the vessel for Gottenburg.

SIR: The letter for the Commissioners of your Transport Board, enclosed on the 24th instant, was, immediately on its reception, sent to the Marshal of New York, to go by the cartel to Gottenburg.

To obviate any further misunderstanding on the subject of Captain Nichols and Barss, it may be proper to remind you that I did not agree to all the propositions made in your letter of the 13th of March relative to them, as you seem to convey in yours of the 24th instant. This will be seen by reference to my letter of the 22d instant.

SIR: Your letter of the [30th] of March I received by this day's post, and I have the satisfaction to acquaint you there is [no] probability of a misunderstanding between you and me respecting the release on parole in these States, or eventual return of Captain Barss to Nova Scotia, as you apprehend might occur in consequence of your letter to me of the 22d ultimo, not precisely conforming to the proposals contained in my letter of the 13th of that month, and to which it was an answer.

In my letter to the Commissioners, I not only enclosed them a copy of your letter of the 22d of March, but concluded it in the words following: "Permit me to request an early answer, so that Captain Barss may be permitted to return to Nova Scotia, in the event of your agreeing to parole or exchange Captain Nichols for him; and I beg leave to call your particular attention to the condition expressed in the Commissary General's letter, a copy whereof, marked A, is enclosed." Extract of a letter from Colonel Thomas Barclay to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated

SEPTEMBER 17, 1813.

I have the honor to enclose to you copies of letters received by the special cartel Roxana, at Boston, from Rear Admiral Griffith, Port Admiral at Halifax, Nova Scotia, and Lieutenant Miller, agent for transports and prisoners of war. I assure you it is with extreme pain I learn from letters that it has been found necessary, on the part of His Majesty, to resort to such unpleasant measures, in consequence of the treatment of British prisoners in these States. Several of my former letters to you have conveyed my opinion that ultimately these measures would be adopted. It is not, at present, my intention to call in question either the justice or policy of this Government in confining British subjects, by way of retaliation, for persons taken on board American ships of war and private armed vessels, claimed and proved to be native born subjects of His Majesty, with the single exception of Captain Nichols, of the Decatur privateer, sent to England to be tried, charged with an offence committed prior to the war, cognizable in His Majesty's ordinary courts of justice. I shall only remark, for your consideration, that there are at least six times as many American prisoners to His Majesty as there are British prisoners in these States; and that, if the system is maintained, the inevitable consequence must be, that all the prisoners on both sides must suffer.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

You will perceive from Lieutenant Miller's letter, and the abstract of prisoners now enclosed, that his Excellency Sir George Prevost has sent a number of American prisoners to Halifax, Nova Scotia, from Quebec; the greater proportion of these are land forces, three hundred and seventy-seven non-commissioned officers and privates, and forty-four commissioned officers, including a few naval characters.

Sir: I avail myself of the opportunity which a vessel, likely to touch at a port in the United States, offers to inform you that your despatch to Sir J. Warren, by the Agnes, containing one letter, dated the 27th of July, together with the copy of a letter to General Mason, was delivered to me; and that, in the absence of Sir John, I thought it necessary to open it.

Understanding from the master of the cartel, as well as from the prisoners that came in her, that the British prisoners put in jail, on a retaliatory order of the American Government, continue in confinement, I have taken upon myself to order the agent here, Lieutenant Miller, to follow the example of the American Government, and immediately to shut up in the jail of this town two American prisoners of war for every British subject he may in future learn, on satisfactory information, are confined in the jails of the United States. I have, &c.

EDWARD GRIFFITH,
Rear Admiral.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant William Miller, British agent for prisoners of war, to Colonel Thomas Barclay, general agent for British prisoners in the United States, dated HALIFAX, August 28, 1813.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 3d ultimo and 2d instant, and herewith beg leave to enclose progressive returns of American and French prisoners of war in my custody to date, and received since my last return, (17th instant,) four hundred and ninety American prisoners of war from Quebec, per His Majesty's ship Regulus and Melpomene, a list of which I cannot transmit, in consequence of my not having been furnished with any from the Melpomene, but trust, by the next conveyance, I will be enabled to forward you the same.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Sept. 22, 1813.

Sir: I received yesterday the letter you did me the honor to address me on the 17th instant, enclosing copies of a communication to you from Mr. Miller, your agent for prisoners at Halifax, dated the 28th of August, and of one from Admiral Griffith, without date; by these I learn, in general terms only, that the officers of your Government at Halifax have thought proper to designate a certain number of American prisoners of war at that place to be imprisoned, on the plea of counter-retaliation for British prisoners of war held in confinement, as you have been from time to time informed, as hostages, to answer for the safety and proper treatment of American prisoners heretofore named to you, unwarrantably detained and transported to England or elsewhere for trial.

On that day I received, also, letters from our agent for prisoners at Halifax, Mr. Mitchell, which came by the same vessel, the cartel Roxana, and which supply that part of the system adopted at Halifax, not disclosed by your despatches. Sixteen American citizens we now know, sir, have been cast into dungeons; six officers of privateers, to wit: two captains, three lieutenants, and a sailing-master, have been thrust into one noisome hole of the area of nine feet by seven, where they are only permitted to receive the means of respiration and the light of heaven through an iron-barred aperture of twenty-four by ten inches. Ten of the brave crew of the Chesapeake frigate, a carpenter, a boatswain, and eight seamen have been crammed into two similar dark and impure receptacles of wretchedness. One hundred and fifty-nine American soldiers and seamen have been picked out from their comrades, and sent to England for trial. I shall for the present, sir, make no comment on the character of these transactions. You must be sensible that the spirit and justice of this nation will not permit such wrongs to go unredressed.

When the measures of the Government are taken you shall be informed. In the meantime, however, it becomes proper to apprize you that these will not, in the smallest degree, be influenced by the consideration which you are pleased to hold up to our view of the present balance of prisoners in your possession. The fortune of war may change this state of things, or the Government may resort to other means of redress against outrages on humanity, if unfortunately they should not be discontinued; but, whatever may at any time be its advantage on this score, you may be assured, sir, that it will never avail itself of the power it may happen to have to violate a solitary principle of right, or cause a single individual to suffer unnecessarily. On all occasions where rigid treatment has been used by us towards any of your prisoners of war, it has been forced on us by some previous act of your officers. Our system has been purely retaliatory, and of the mildest nature, since the manner of the confinement has never as yet been used by us to inflict punishment, or made more close than was requisite to hold secure against escape the persons of the individuals designated, ultimately, to answer for consequences; and we have never failed to release instantly, on being informed that the cause for retaliation had ceased.

I have not made these observations, sir, to divert you from your purpose. If it is taken, as seems to be indicated by the course pursued at Halifax, we are ready to meet, by corresponding measures, every treatment of prisoners taken in war, unauthorized by the practice of nations, as well as that of other of our citizens, held in confinement by the authorities of your Government, much, perhaps too much, of which has not heretofore been brought into account, in the constant hope that a relaxation on your part might prevent the opening of wounds additional to those necessarily inflicted by the ordinary course of civilized warfare. On the other hand, I have more than once had occasion to assure you, and now with the greater sincerity repeat, that I have been constantly instructed, and that it is most ardently my own wish, so to conduct the treatment of prisoners of war, as that the only emulation between us will be who shall most frequently and most effectually alleviate the sufferings of the unfortunate individuals whom the fortune of war may, from time to time, place in the respective power of the two Governments.

I earnestly invite your attention, sir, to the alternative, and shall, I pray you to believe, much rejoice if you adopt the latter. I have &c.

J. MASON.

Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

HALIFAX, September 2, 1813.

SIR: I have written you much, under different dates, to go by this vessel, the Roxana. I have yet much to write, and, if possible, of a more unpleasant nature than what I have had occasion to mention since my coming here.

I mention being informed of our prisoners being sent to the jail here. Last night brought me a letter from Mr. James Trask, Captain Lane, and four others, informing me of their having been brought from Melville island, and were then confined in the dungeon of the common jail.

This morning, at eight o'clock, I sent a letter to Mr. Miller, of which you have herewith a copy. About three, P. M., he called on and accompanied me to the jail; there I found the persons mentioned on the list herewith. The six officers of privateers are in one dungeon, having a light of about twenty-four by ten inches, grated. The dungeon is nine feet by seven feet. In two similar holes are ten men belonging to the crew of the Chesapeake, five in each. I have already informed you eleven of this crew have been sent on board different of His Britannic Majesty's ships of war. In addition to this, I lament to have occasion to inform you that, besides the fifty-nine men belonging to our troops sent here from Canada, they have picked one hundred seamen from the prison at Melville island, chiefly from crews of privateers. They are embarked, and ready to sail for England. I have asked for the list, which the agent has promised me. A copy shall be sent you as early as possible. I could not describe, even if time would admit, how painful this unwarrantable conduct renders my situation. As Mr. Miller did not answer my last letters, he proposed to me to see the admiral, informing me Admiral Griffith had said to him he would see me at any time; but I declined the invitation, satisfied no good could result from it.

He had taken his measures, and before I could see him to-morrow our men will be out of the harbor, and no supplication on my part would relieve one of the sixteen from their horrid dungeon. It is their country that must redress them. They are all in spirits, confident it will do so. Be assured, sir, that this, nor harsher treatment, will intimidate a man who is here in confinement, and I hope it will rouse every man who is at home.

I must here observe to you that on Mr. Miller's calling on me, and not having written to me, I complained of his stating the men as having entered or given themselves up as British subjects. His reply was, it was in consequence of the report made from the ships to him, though it was evident he did not believe a man had given himself up as a British subject. I complained of it as an unmanly subterfuge, and a breach of the cartel. Besides the list he gave me, he mentioned three had been sent to England in the Spartan, Captain Brenton; she sailed a few days since. I shall receive their names and forward them to you.

As the men ordered for England from the prison were badly off for clothes, and I could not procure any ready made, I requested Mr. Miller to supply them with shirts, shoes, &c., from his stores, which he has promised me to do. This I hope will meet your approbation.

I am sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN MITCHELL.

JOHN MASON, Esq., Commissary, &c.

HALIFAX, September 3, 1813.

SIR: It was with much concern that I yesterday learned several American prisoners of war, one of them Mr. James Trask, were in the dungeon of the common prison in this town. Will you, sir, be pleased to inform me the particular offence of each person who has been moved from Melville island to the jail here, or why it has been done, and whether I can visit them alone to-day? if not, if you will do me the honor to accompany me, and at what hour?

As regards Mr. Trask, I beg to remind you of a conversation that took place in my office, in which I informed you, that it had been reported Mr. Trask was likely to receive severe treatment for having broken his parole, and going to sea previous to his exchange; that the marshal finding Mr. Lightbody, of the Maidstone British frigate in like situation, he would detain him, subject to similar treatment as Mr. Trask. On your assuring me Mr. Trask should be treated and exchanged like the other prisoners, and exchanged with them, I wrote Mr. Prince, the marshal at Boston; in consequence of which Mr. Lightbody was permitted to return here in the Agnes. He, I presume, is now here, and can explain the treatment he received at Boston. Further remarks I shall not make on this business, until I have the honor to hear from you. I am, sir, &c.

JOHN MITCHELL,

Agent U. S. for exchange of prisoners.

Lt. WM. MILLER, Agent for Prisoners.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Thomas Barclay to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1813.

Your letter of the 22d current, in answer to a part of my letter of the 17th instant, I have had the honor to receive. The copies of letters then enclosed to you contained all the information I had received from Halifax on the subject of American prisoners put into confinement in retaliation for British prisoners confined in the United States. It is not in my power to contradict Mr. Mitchell's statement, either with respect to the places in which these prisoners have been confined, or that "one hundred and fifty-nine other prisoners, soldiers, and seamen, have been picked out from the American prisoners, and sent to England for trial." I am, however, led to doubt the correctness of his information with regard to the former, from the expressions in Rear Admiral Griffith's letter, that he had taken upon himself to order the agent, Lieutenant Miller, to follow the example of the American Government, and immediately to shut up in the jail of this town (Halifax) two American prisoners for every British subject he may in future learn, on satisfactory information, are confined in the jails of the United States; the words "in the jail of this town" not comporting either with dungeons or noisome holes, &c., represented by Mr. Mitchell. Not any of my letters notice prisoners being sent to England for trial. Had this been the case, I feel assured Lieutenant Miller would have mentioned it; because, in accounting for the number of prisoners, he is very particular, and in his last return he gives the names of (I think ten) prisoners, who had acknowledged themselves British subjects, and had been turned over to His Majesty's ships of war. If he, therefore, noticed ten, I think it more than probable he would one hundred and fifty-nine. This, however, is simply a deduction from analogy, and I beg leave to repeat, I do not contradict Mr. Mitchell's assertion.

Whatever may be the situation of the American prisoners thus confined in the jail at Halifax, it is evidently the consequence of His Majesty's subjects having been confined in the United States of America, by way of retaliation for British subjects (with the exception of Captain Nichols, of the Decatur privateer,) taken in arms against their King, and sent to England for trial.

It rests with this Government to determine whether it will continue its claims to protect His Majesty's subjects found on the high seas, or in His Majesty's dominions, in arms against their sovereign, at the expense of the ease, comfort, and perhaps lives, of its native citizens, or restore them to freedom, by abandoning a doctrine not acknowledged by any European Power.

I pass over, without remark, the remainder of your letter, on the unpleasant part of this subject, as the propriety of these measures must be considered, and effectually corrected, by our respective Governments; and hasten to assure you, that it is His Majesty's earnest desire that the subjects and citizens of both nations, made prisoners during the war, may receive every comfort and indulgence that humanity dictates.

OFFICE COMM'Y GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Sept. 28, 1813.

SIR: By late advices from our agent at Halifax for prisoners, we are informed that the enemy have dealt out to a number of our prisoners of war in their possession at that place a most inhuman and violent degree of punishment, in retaliation, as they allege, for the confinement of certain prisoners of theirs held by us as hostages, to answer for the safety and proper treatment of several of our officers and seamen, made prisoners of war by them, unjustifiably held, and sent off to England or other places for trial. They have actually thrown sixteen of our citizens (a descriptive list of whom is annexed) into dungeons, the dimensions of which are nine feet by seven, having each a single grated light of about twenty-four by ten inches; the six officers of privateers lie together, tortured in one of these wretched holes, and five of the Chesapeake's crew in each of two others.

The British authorities at Halifax have, moreover, selected from the mass of our prisoners in their possession, and sent to England on the plea of their being British subjects, one hundred seamen and fifty-nine soldiers.

These proceedings call loudly on the Government for redress; it is to be lamented that this can be only had by causing the cruelty of the enemy to be felt also by their own subjects, individually innocent. I am commanded by the President to direct that you will, with as little delay as possible, after the reception of this order, designate and confine in dungeons, similar, as nearly as possible, to those I have described as used by the enemy, sixteen prisoners of war, British subjects, now in your charge, or who will very soon be so placed by the late arrangement made, as you are advised, of marching all the prisoners on the maritime frontier East of you to Salem; that is to say, six officers of privateers, of as nearly equal rank as can be done with those enumerated in the annexed list, now so confined at Halifax, and ten of the crew of the late British sloop-of-war Boxer; that is, one boatswain and one carpenter, or two petty officers of equal rank, and eight seamen, there to be held in retaliation for the cruelty exercised by the enemy at Halifax on a like number of our prisoners, as before stated; and further, that you will immediately designate one hundred other seamen, British subjects, prisoners of war, belonging to men of war, privateers, and merchantmen, separate them from the ordinary prisoners of war, place them in close confinement, so as to prevent effectually the means of escape, but not to inflict punishment, and there hold them as hostages, to answer for the safety and proper treatment of the one hundred American seamen sent from Halifax to England, in the manner I have already described. You will inform all those unfortunate persons so designated and confined, of the causes by which such a measure has been forced on us, and you will be pleased to make a speedy and regular return. For the treatment of the fifty-nine soldiers I will give the requisite orders in another quarter.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MASON.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners, to Colonel Thomas Barclay, dated

SEPTEMBER 29, 1813.

In your letter of the 17th instant, I am informed that Sir George Prevost had sent a number of American prisoners, amounting to three hundred and seventy-seven non-commissioned officers and privates, and forty-four commissioned officers, principally land forces, from the station for exchange at Quebec to that of Halifax. Desirous of confining my observations at that time to a distinct subject, I did not, in my reply to part of your letter of that date, make any remarks on this most unexpected proceeding. I have now, sir, to demand the reasons for that unjustifiable step, which can but be considered as in direct hostility with the provisions of the cartel, and as a measure replete with harshness and severity towards our officers and men so removed; since they have been thus subjected to an inconvenient and dangerous sea voyage, (by which many, as I am informed by Mr. Mitchell, have suffered much,) and placed in a situation more remote and difficult as to communication for exchange, without any plea of necessity or safety. What was intended by this removal, or what other measures of a similar nature may be in contemplation by your officers, is not for me to anticipate; but it is proper to inform you that letters have been received from some of our officers of rank, prisoners in Canada, communicating that it has been intimated by the commander of the British forces that he intended sending a considerable part of our land forces to England, and among them some, if not all, of the General officers. I find in your letter of the 22d instant, the following passage: "You will perceive, from my letter to you of the 17th instant, that his Excellency Sir George Prevost has found it necessary to send a number of American officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, from Quebec to Halifax. I regret this circumstance, as we were, as you say, on the eve of exchanging them by a land route; that is now out of our power. I request your answer for the proposal contained in my letter of the 17th instant."

Am I to understand from this that all the American prisoners are already, or will be, removed from Quebec? My impressions were, that you hold there about double the number of those reported to have been sent to Halifax. Be pleased to inform me on this subject.

If the remaining part of the troops be not removed, I must remonstrate, in the most positive terms, as well against what has been done, as against any future removal of our officers or men from the station in Canada appointed for exchanges, to other and distant stations, by useless and harassing voyages by sea.

HARLEM, October 1, 1813.

SIR: In my letter to you of the 27th of September, in answer to yours of the 22d of that month, I acquainted you that Lieutenant Miller, His Majesty's agent for transports and prisoners of war at Halifax, had not, in his communications to me, made mention of any American prisoners having been sent to England, and that Rear Admiral Griffith had also been silent on that subject. I at the same time gave you my reasons for doubting the fact.

I yesterday, however, received a letter from Lieutenant Miller, dated the 17th of September, in which were enclosed copies of the names of one hundred and one naval and fifty-nine military prisoners sent to England in His Majesty's ships Melpomene and Regulus. Copies of these lists I have the honor to enclose you. You will perceive that the fifty-nine soldiers sent to England are deserters from His Majesty's service, and the name of the regiment to which each of them belonged placed opposite their names. With respect to the one hundred and one seamen, you will observe that Lieutenant Miller notices three who were sent, "supposed to be British subjects," opposite to whose names he has made this notice (†). He has also placed a mark (*) opposite to the names of fifteen other seamen, who he says are "men who have been twice found in arms before they were exchanged." Eighty-three of the seamen sent to England have no mark opposite to their names. I regret this circumstance, as it is my anxious wish to give every possible information on the subject. I apprehend they are men who have acknowledged themselves to be British subjects. I shall, however, avail myself of the earliest conveyance to request Lieutenant Miller to give me the reasons respecting the eighty-three seamen thus sent to England, and shall communicate it to you when received.

A copy of the return of sixteen American prisoners confined in the town jail at Halifax, as a retaliatory measure for eight British prisoners imprisoned in the United States, I transmit herewith. Four of these are confined for Squirrell and Russell, of His Majesty's ship Dragon; but as you have since released Squirrell and Russell, and I have sent Admiral Sir John B. Warren notice of it, the four men now in confinement will be released the instant my letter is received. I shall forward a duplicate, and also write Lieutenant Miller to release the four American prisoners confined for Squirrell and Russell.

I have the honor to be, sir, your ob't servant,
THOMAS BARCLAY.

OCTOBER 3, 1813.

I have prepared an extract of that letter [from the Commissary General of Prisoners, of 22d September] to be sent with one from me to Lieutenant Miller, His Majesty's agent for prisoners at Halifax, requesting him to inform me whether the American prisoners confined in the town jail at that place are treated in the manner it has been reported to you, and stating the nature of the confinement and treatment the British prisoners experience who are held under retaliatory orders from this Government. I cannot persuade myself they are put in such places as those you describe, because Mr. Miller writes me they are confined in the town jail. If they were immured in cells under ground, I think he would have so expressed himself.

OCTOBER 4, 1813.

I assure you that I had no information of the sending, or the intention of sending, the American prisoners from Quebec to Halifax, until I received Lieutenant Miller's letter on the subject, and I did not delay a moment to communicate to you an event equally opposed to my inclination and yours. I, however, am convinced Sir George had good reasons for the measures. I do not know of any other prisoners having been sent to England than those specified in the two lists enclosed to you on the 1st instant. These were, or at least are stated to be, native subjects of His Majesty. It is not to be credited that bona fide American citizens, prisoners of war, unless under very special circumstances, will be sent to England.

OCTOBER 9, 1813.

Your several letters of the 1st, 3d, and 4th of this month have been received. With respect to the seamen and soldiers (American) sent from Halifax to England, whose case I stated in my letter of the 22d September, and lists of whom you have sent me, I will at present only remark, that, as to the fifty-nine soldiers, I am by no means prepared to admit that they were deserters from the British service when they enlisted in ours. The list even which you send does not so state it, but as to part; and, in the next place, when the prisoners of either party are taken from the ordinary state of prisoners, are sent off, or are confined, or rigidly treated, under any plea, the other has a right to expect more full and satisfactory evidence than such as you exhibit. Mr. Mitchell, our agent at Halifax, applied in vain to have these men examined, or some evidence adduced respecting them. Again, what has been furnished by your agents is contradictory in itself. The list furnished Mr. Mitchell at Halifax is headed, "Return of soldiers taken in arms in Upper Canada, belonging to the United States' Army, who have delivered themselves up as British subjects." In the list you have furnished, that plea is abandoned, and they are called, in part at least, deserters. I beg leave to refer you (as you have the correspondence) to the letter of Mr. Mitchell to Mr. Miller, of the 1st of September, where he remonstrates on this subject, and states that one of the soldiers he had conversed with, and the only one he had seen, claimed to be an American, named the State and county in which he was born, and entreated his interference. On the list of the one hundred and one seamen, American prisoners, sent off to England, you admit that against eighty-three you know of no charge; you apprehend they have given themselves up as British subjects. You state that three are supposed to be British subjects, and that fifteen have been twice taken in arms.

You cannot certainly apprehend that American citizens, native or naturalized, would give themselves up as British subjects; and it is almost as difficult to suppose that a British subject, if there were such taken in arms against his country, would voluntarily discover himself. These are self-evident propositions, about which no argument is necessary.

If there were any taken twice in arms, a treatment different from that to ordinary prisoners was to have been expected; but we claim, and shall insist on being furnished with, the circumstances attending each case, as I furnished you, in the case of Midshipman Lightbody, in my letter of the 13th of June, that an opportunity may be afforded of examining into the facts; and, until such information is given, it must be considered that these men so detained are unjustly treated by your officers.

I shall probably soon have some cases of a similar kind to bring to your notice, and I solicit your attention to the course to be adopted, as well as to proofs as to treatment.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to the Marshal of Massachusetts, dated

WASHINGTON, October 11, 1813.

SIR: Since the date of my letter of the 28th September, directing the confinement, and its particular manner in each case, of six officers and one hundred seamen, I have received letters from our agent, Mr. Mitchell, at Halifax, dated the 12th of September, by which I find the nature of the confinement of the six officers and ten of the Chesapeake's crew, which I then described to you, although yet inhumanly rigid, is somewhat changed. The following is the passage of his letter on the subject: "I visited, to-day, the jail and prison at Melville island. I found the six officers removed to the upper part of the jail; the room is tolerable, though small for six persons, who are allowed no exercise out of it. The ten of the Chesapeake's crew are still in the cells, but are allowed to walk in the yard in the day, while sentinels attend. The allowance of the whole is the same as at Melville island." I understand, by this, that the six American officers of privates and merchantmen have been taken out of the dungeon and put into a small upper room, and there constantly kept; and that the two under officers and eight men of the Chesapeake are still confined in the same dungeons before described to you, but are allowed to walk occasionally in the day, under guard. You are, therefore, now requested, sir, to make the mode of confinement, as nearly as possible, of the six officers and ten under officers and crew of the Boxer, directed, in my order of the 28th, to be as nearly as possible similar, for each class, to that described in the foregoing extract from Mr. Mitchell.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS.

WASHINGTON, October 12, 1813.

SIR: This will instruct you, by order of the President, to designate, immediately on reception of this letter, fifty-nine prisoners, British subjects, in your custody, soldiers or marines, not of the militia, and the first in preference, if you have as many, whom you will separate from the ordinary prisoners, place in close confinement, so as to prevent certainly the means of escape; and you will so hold them, subject to further orders from this office, as hostages, to answer for the safety and proper treatment of fifty-nine of our prisoners, soldiers, unjustifiably lately sent, in confinement, from Halifax to England. In making your designation for this purpose, if you hold more than the requisite number of soldiers, (many of whom, I understand, served as marines on board the fleet lately captured on the lake,) you will designate by lot; and so, too, with the marines, if you have recourse to them next in order. When you have completed your designation, you will make an immediate return to this office, descriptive of names, corps to which belonging, where captured, &c.

You will inform the unfortunate men, so selected and confined, fully of the cause of this measure. You will issue to them the same rations, &c., allowed to other prisoners; and you will in no way make their treatment more rigid, at this time, than may be necessary to prevent escape. I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MASON.

THOMAS STEELE, Esq.

Deputy Marshal of Ohio.

Extract of a letter from John Mitchell, Esq., United States' agent for prisoners of war in Nova Scotia, to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

SHERWOOD, NEAR HALIFAX,

October 18, 1813.

I send you herewith a copy of a letter I received yesterday from Lieutenant Miller, agent for prisoners here, dated the 17th.

You will perceive he reverts back to my letter and inquiry, dated the 4th, in order to communicate the intention of the Commander-in-chief to send to England the major part of the prisoners at this station; here, then, we have, without disguise, the intentions of the Commander-in-chief, and we, I presume, will take measures accordingly, and efficient ones.

Our people are at present very sickly at Melville island; there are daily deaths; the climate is very inimical to our people, especially such as are anywise inclined to complaints in the breast; and the troops from Canada have suffered much from diarrhoea here; there are of them from fifteen to twenty constantly in the hospital. We have lost above thirty persons within a month past; and there are fifty-six persons now in the hospitals, and, from appearances, [the 15th] most of them dangerously ill. In general, they are in good spirits, and all preferring to suffer, rather than our Government to suffer itself to be dictated to, or to sacrifice any right.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Miller, agent for British prisoners, to John Mitchell, Esq., agent for American prisoners at Halifax.

OCTOBER 17, 1813.

I have also communed with the Commander-in-chief on that part of your letter of the 4th instant, wherein you request to be informed whether there is any prospect of a cartel being sent from hence to the United States with prisoners of war, and what number will probably be sent before Winter sets in.

I am directed to state, that, in consequence of the present measures adopted by the American Government towards British prisoners of war, and their detention in various parts of the United States, contrary to the stipulated agreement in the cartel, he is determined to send the major part of those now in my custody to England, as soon as the transports arrive from Quebec.

Mr. Mason to Colonel Barclay.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23, 1813.

SIR: When you were lately at the seat of Government, I communicated to you, personally, that retaliatory measures had been resorted to by this Government for certain highly unjustifiable acts of your officers at Halifax, stated at large in my letter to you of the 23d of September.

I now transmit you two returns from the Marshal of Massachusetts; one of one hundred and one British maritime prisoners of war, designated and confined to answer in their persons for the proper treatment and safety of one hundred and one American maritime prisoners of war, enumerated in the same return, taken from the ordinary state of prisoners at Halifax, and sent to England for trial; and one of sixteen British maritime prisoners of war, confined, six in close custody, and ten in dungeons, as hostages in like manner, and in retaliation for similar severity inflicted on sixteen American maritime prisoners, also there described. Orders have been given to designate and confine, separately from the other non-paroled prisoners, fifty-nine British soldiers, prisoners of war at Chillicothe, in the State of Ohio, to be held to answer for the safety and proper treatment of fifty-nine American soldiers sent to England from Halifax in August last, in the manner before mentioned. As to our maritime prisoners, relative to whom returns have not yet been received, as soon as they come in a copy shall be furnished to you.

As the settled determination of this Government, on subjects of this nature, has been already more than once made known to you, I shall, on this occasion, make but few remarks. In my letter of the 9th of October, I adverted to the singular heading used by your officers, and then for the first time resorted to, which was placed over the returns of our prisoners, designated for the purposes before mentioned, declaring that they had given themselves up as British subjects. This I then insisted, from the very nature of the case, carried with it its own contradiction.

First, protesting against any construction which may be used, in the most remote degree, to throw the proofs in such cases on this Government, and against all commitment as to the description of persons captured in our service, whom it may deem proper to claim and defend, I have now to inform you sir, that I have in my possession the means of showing the falsity of that declaration, by documents of the most minute and unquestionable kind, establishing the birth, within the United States, of very many of our prisoners so designated and described. (a)

But, sir, these are not the only cases in which it is plainly shown how the conduct of your officers, in seizing and separating our captured men from the ordinary state of prisoners, and subjecting them to long and painful confinement, has stood self-condemned on their own assumed ground. I will instance, among many that might be cited, the cases of five at least of the six men from the crew of the Nautilus; the six men of the crew of the privateer Sarah Ann, thus taken, long held, and finally discharged; and the twelve men of the crew of the Wasp, taken and held in like manner, three of whom have fallen a sacrifice to, and died during, severe confinement, and the remaining nine, as you have informed me, are at length restored to the ordinary state of prisoners in Halifax for exchange. In this last instance I refer you, sir, to the letter from Commodore Beresford to Admiral Warren, of which I furnished you a copy, and in which he states, explicitly, that he had designated and detained them merely on suspicion, and because our officers could not, of their own knowledge, declare that they were native born Americans.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MASON.

Col. THOS. BARCLAY, &c.

Colonel Barclay to Mr. Mason.

HARLEM, November 30, 1813.

Sir: I have received your letter of the 24th instant, with copies of two lists from the Marshal of Massachusetts; the first exhibiting the names of one hundred and one British maritime prisoners of war, designated and confined, as you inform me, to answer in their persons for the proper treatment and safety of one hundred and one American maritime prisoners, enumerated in the same list, taken from the ordinary state of prisoners at Halifax, and sent to England for trial; the second list details the names of sixteen other British seamen, prisoners, confined, six of them in close custody, and ten in dungeons, as hostages, in like manner, and in retaliation for similar severity inflicted on sixteen American seamen, prisoners, therein described.

You acquaint me, at the same time, that orders have been given to designate and confine, separately from the non-paroled other prisoners, fifty-nine British soldiers, prisoners at Chillicothe, in the State of Ohio, to be held to answer for the safety and proper treatment of a similar number of American soldiers sent to England from Halifax, relative to whom returns had not yet been received, but that when they came in a copy should be sent me.

I am much obliged to you for the list sent, and will thank you for a copy of the third list when you receive the original.

I have more than once stated to you, sir, that I had been directed by my Government to abstain from intermeddling on these unpleasant national points, but to leave them to be discussed and arranged by the two Governments.

If your Government, as you hint, is in possession of any documents that may tend to the release of any Americans confined in a special manner, and feels inclined to communicate them to His Majesty's Ministers, or to Admiral Sir John Warren, I will with pleasure transmit them.

I refrain making any remarks on several expressions you have used in your letter; it is probable, had you re-examined the letter, you would either have omitted or softened them. Harsh expressions tend to irritate, not to convince.

Were I authorized to enter upon the subject of your remarks, I should state, as known and acknowledged principles, that a sovereign has a right to inquire, by the ordinary process of law, whether any of the persons made prisoners during war, by his forces, naval or military, are his subjects, and, on conviction, to punish them accordingly; that reasonable suspicion was sufficient ground to direct an inquiry; that it was the duty of His Majesty's officers to apprehend and send to England for trial all such prisoners as there were strong reasons to believe were native subjects of His Majesty. I should, at the same time, acquaint you that on such trials the onus probandi lay on the part of the prosecution, and that evidence on the part of the prisoner could only be necessary to rebut other testimony.

I shall avail myself of the earliest conveyances to transmit to His Majesty's commissioners, and to the Admiral-in-chief, copies of your letter, and of the list above-mentioned.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS BARCLAY.

General MASON.

DECEMBER 9, 1813.

On the receipt of your letter to me of the 22d of September, in which you communicate the information Mr. Mitchell, the American agent for prisoners of war at Halifax, had detailed to you, respecting the treatment of sixteen American prisoners, placed in close confinement at Halifax, on principles of retaliation, I remarked in my reply, that although I would not hazard, from want of information, to contradict Mr. Mitchell's assertions, still that I could not give credit to them, as they differed so materially from Rear Admiral Griffith's and Lieutenant Miller's representation.

Anxious to obtain satisfactory information on this point, I availed myself of the earliest information to request of Lieutenant Miller a correct and particular description of the places in which these sixteen Americans were confined in the town jail of Halifax, and the treatment they receive, together with a general description of the prison-ship and hospital at Melville island, where ordinary prisoners of war are confined. By the same conveyance, I requested a mercantile friend of mine to visit the jail where the sixteen American prisoners were confined, examine their apartments, and minutely to inspect the prison-ship and hospital at Melville island.

I yesterday received Lieutenant Miller's official answer, also a private letter from my friend, extracts of which I have the honor to enclose to you. I also enclose an extract of that part of your letter to me of the 22d September, in which you communicate the statement which Mr. Mitchell had transmitted to you of the dungeons, dark and impure receptacles of wretchedness, &c., in which sixteen prisoners were confined. You will be pleased to contrast the whole together, and draw such conclusions therefrom as the respective documents merit.

I beg you will notice particularly the enclosed copy of a letter from the Sheriff of Halifax to Lieutenant Miller, on the subject of the rooms in which the prisoners were confined, and a copy of Mr. Mitchell's letter to Lieutenant Miller, in which he acknowledges that the removal of the prisoners from the rooms in which they were confined in the jail to the common prison on Melville island, "was a change not for the better." With respect to the prison on Melville island, or the treatment the prisoners received there, I do not recollect your having at any time made complaint. I have personally examined several American prisoners on the subject, who expressed their satisfaction as to the place and treatment, and observed that confinement and a scanty allowance were all they complained of. The prisoners, from Mr. Mitchell's account, appear to regret the "dark and impure receptacles of wretchedness" they have left, which they prefer to the pleasant, healthy, and comfortable island on which they are now confined. For this exchange they are wholly indebted to Mr. Mitchell.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Mitchell to Lieutenant Miller, dated SHERWOOD, November 3, 1813.

SIR: I was honored with your letter of the 25th ultimo, informing me of the removal of the American prisoners from the town jail to the prison-ship at Melville island, and that removal I presumed would have been an amelioration of their situation; but on visiting them yesterday, I learned from them that their situation is worse than the town jail, except the indulgence of the prison-yard and of seeing their fellow-prisoners; on the whole, the change for them is not a change for the better.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN MITCHELL.

HALIFAX, November 8, 1813.

MY DEAR SIR: Agreeably to your request, I, on the 6th instant, went through the jail, and every part of the prison-ship, other jails, and hospitals for the prisoners. I found that every part of the jail was perfectly dry and comfortable; there are no dungeons; the rooms where the Americans were confined are about twelve feet by seven, a window opening to fresh air, and another in the door, which communicates with a large hall. The jail is in a high part of the town, and these rooms are about two-thirds below the surface of the ground. The room the officers were confined in is in the second story, twenty feet by twelve, two windows, with fine prospects. From nine in the morning till four in the afternoon, the prisoners were permitted the free use of a large yard; rather, indeed, a field. In consequence of the false statements in the American newspapers, I am informed those prisoners who were in the jail are now on board the prison-ship. From the jail I went to Melville island, where the prison-ship lies, and on which the prisons, &c., are erected; it is a beautiful little island, surrounded by salt water, which supplies an abundance and variety of fish; the situation must be as healthy as any in the world. I first went through the prison-ship, which is very large, and kept in much better order than I could have anticipated. She is completely housed over, by which means they have tiers of apartments above water, and she is upwards of six feet clear between the beams. No prisoners are kept in that part of the ship below water, and a great part of the day the prisoners are on shore in the open air, when the weather permits. I then went to the hospital room, which is in the upper part of a high building, where they have as much air as they please.

I am, with respect, sir, your ob't. servant.

Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

HALIFAX, November 24, 1813.

SIR: In reply to your letter of this day, requesting to be informed of the state and condition of the apartment assigned for the safe-keeping of several prisoners of war, ordered to be held in the county jail in September last, I beg leave to observe, that the apartments allotted to them were in every respect suitable, and sufficiently large and well ventilated, and every possible indulgence granted to them during their confinement, which was consistent with their situation. And I must beg leave to observe, when they understood that they were to return to Melville island, they expressed their sorrow at being removed, and acknowledged, in my presence, the indulgence which they had received from the jailer and his family. The first two or three days after they came to the jail, we were obliged to keep them rather more closely confined than they were afterwards, when three apartments were allotted to them, and the use of the entry for those below; and the privateersmen were put into a room by themselves, up stairs, sufficiently large for their accommodation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JONES FAWSON,

Sheriff of the County of Halifax.

Lieut. MILLER, Agent for Prisoners, &c.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Miller, agent for British prisoners at Halifax, to Colonel Thomas Barclay, dated

NOVEMBER 24, 1813.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th ultimo, enclosing me an extract taken from General Mason's, dated Washington, 22d September, 1813, and beg leave to transmit herewith, for your better information, the following particulars, which will evidently confute the authenticity of said extract.

Description of the town jail, viz: dimensions of each cell, eleven by seven feet eight inches; seven feet four inches high; windows, twenty-four by seventeen inches; another in the door nine inches square, together with being allowed a free intercourse during the night, with a passage of thirty by five feet, and eight feet high, at the end of which is a window of twenty-four by seventeen inches, with the use of other cells of the above dimensions, and windows as before described, were the places where ten prisoners were confined from four in the afternoon until nine o'clock in the morning.

The six officers were confined in an upper room, of twenty by twelve feet, and eight feet high, with two windows of four by three feet each, commanding a pleasant prospect of the surrounding country and harbor, with permission to take the air occasionally in a yard of eighty-four feet square (accompanied by the seamen.)

When confined on board the ship, they had the following accommodation: Between decks, twenty by fourteen feet, with two scuttles; also a similar space in the lower deck of the same dimensions and accommodations, with scuttles also, and permission to visit the prison yard from nine to four. P. M. With respect to the prisoners sent to England in the Regulus, was, in consequence of a number of prisoners being daily expected from Quebec, together with the crowded state of the prison, the season very hot, and the small-pox being very prevalent, the ultimate cause of Admiral Griffith's directing me to send them away. I also selected some who had endeavored to effect their escape, with others who had shown a mutinous disposition; and those marked thus (†) were supposed to be British subjects.

Having enclosed Captain Kempt's letter (at Quebec) respecting the soldiers suspected to be also British subjects, is all the information respecting them I have in my possession, in consequence of their never being in my custody, only inserted on my books, for the purpose of supplying them with a suit of clothes each.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant William Miller, British agent for prisoners of war, to the right honorable Sir J. B. Warren, Bart., K. B., Admiral of the Blue and Commander-in-Chief, dated HALIFAX, N. S., Nov. 25, 1813.

The following are the dimensions of the cells in the jail of Halifax: cells, about six feet beneath the surface, lined with plank all around.

Length, eleven feet to the door; breadth, seven feet eight inches; height, seven feet four inches. Grate at the end for the admission of light and air.

Height, one foot eight inches; breadth, one foot five inches; small grate at each door.

Passage between the cells: Length, thirty feet; breadth, five feet; height, eight feet.

A grate at the end of the passage to cell doors.

A commodious room upstairs: Length, twenty feet three inches; breadth, twelve feet; height, eight feet; two windows fronting the road, four feet by three, with a chimney. This room fronts the main road, and the prisoners have a complete view of the harbor and surrounding country.

Area of the yard eighty-four feet, where the prisoners were permitted to remain from nine to four o'clock.

W. MILLER,
Agent for Prisoners of War.

HARLEM, December 9, 1813.

SIR: Your letter of the 9th of October was on its way to this place at the moment I was on the road to Washington, and was afterwards transmitted to me thither. Both your time and mine were so wholly engaged during the period I remained at Washington that I had not a moment in which to reply; and, on my return home, I was induced to delay the answer, in the hope of receiving full and satisfactory information from Lieutenant Miller, His Majesty's agent for prisoners. I yesterday received letters and documents from him, which I trust will remove many of the objections you have stated to me respecting the conduct of His Majesty's servants towards American prisoners.

In your letter above mentioned, you remark that "as to the fifty-nine soldiers, (alluding to those sent to England in His Majesty's ship Melpomene,) you are by no means prepared to admit that they were deserters from the British service when they enlisted into the United States' service; and that the list which I had forwarded to you did not so state it, but as to part." You further remark, that when the prisoners of either party are taken from the ordinary state of prisoners, and sent off, or are confined or rigidly treated, under any plea, the other has a right to expect more full and satisfactory evidence than that which I had exhibited to you; (alluding to the copies of papers from Lieutenant Miller on the subject of the fifty-nine men, and other papers,) that Mr. Mitchell, the American agent at Halifax, had applied in vain to have these men examined, or some evidence adduced respecting them; and that the papers transmitted to me by Lieutenant Miller were in contradiction to one delivered to Mr. Mitchell. That being called "return of soldiers taken in arms in Upper Canada belonging to the United States' Army, who have delivered themselves up as British deserters;" whereas, in the list sent me, that description was abandoned and the prisoners were called in part, at least, deserters.

It would ill comport with your private character as a citizen of the United States, or in your official capacity, to admit a fact unsolicited by His Majesty, and which would manifestly tend to the injury of individuals serving in the American Army. Whether these men are native subjects of His Majesty, and whether they are deserters from British regiments, are facts to be ascertained by the proper tribunals instituted in Great Britain. The men will have a fair trial, and, unless the facts are fully proved, they will be acquitted and placed with the American prisoners. I agree with you, sir, that very satisfactory information is due, in the cases referred to in the extract of your letter, from one nation to another; and I should imagine that the official returns of His Majesty's officers would, in the first instance, prove satisfactory so far as to induce your Government to consider there was sufficient cause for sending the fifty-nine prisoners to England for trial. I cannot believe that Mr. Mitchell has been refused any reasonable request for satisfactory information respecting the fifty-nine men; at the same time, permit me to add, that, if such is the fact, it precisely accords with the treatment I received on my application respecting Dennis and Morrison, seamen belonging to His Majesty's ship Victorious, claimed by the French agent, respecting whom, in my letter to you of the 11th of June, I made a reasonable and respectful request, which was neither attended to nor granted; on the contrary, these men were either delivered to the French agent or liberated, without affording me an opportunity of proving that they were not Frenchmen, by their own confession, in opposition to the depositions on which I take it for granted their release was founded.

It is not difficult to explain what appears to you contradictory, from the caption of the papers respectively sent by Lieutenant Miller to Mr. Mitchell and myself.

The first, from the description you gave me, and which, from being marked with inverted commas, appears a quotation from the documents sent from Mr. Miller, is styled "A return of soldiers taken in arms in Upper Canada, belonging to the United States' Army, who have delivered themselves up as British deserters." The second, to wit, the documents sent by Lieutenant Miller to me, and of which I transmitted you a just copy, is styled "A list of American prisoners of war received into the custody of Lieutenant Miller, and sent to England on board the Melpomene." On the top of this was written, in Lieutenant Miller's own hand, by way of memorandum, "sent to England, supposed to be British subjects." The list sent to me by Lieutenant Miller was an ordinary list to account for alterations since his last return of prisoners, and not to designate the cause of these men being sent. He was, therefore, under no obligation to be particular in describing the cause; indeed, it would have been incorrect in him to have stated the particulars in a common monthly list, intended merely to account for alterations during the month. Lieutenant Miller, however, in his official return to me of the 30th of September, heads that part of his list of American prisoners "Lists of British subjects found in arms in Upper Canada, and delivered themselves up, and sent to England." A copy of this part of his return I have the honor to enclose, which at once reconciles all the contradiction you originally supposed; and you will perceive that these British subjects are not "called in part," but each of them specified as belonging to a particular regiment. I confess, however, I am not fully satisfied whether the figures and words, 14th regiment, 6th regiment, 1st light infantry, 14th foot, and 1st, are intended as descriptive of the American regiments to which they belonged at the time they were made prisoners, or the British regiment from which it is said they originally deserted. On this point Lieutenant Miller informs me it is not in his power to afford any information. I shall, therefore, request an explanation from his Excellency Lieutenant General Sir George Prevost, and, on receiving his answer, communicate it to you.

With respect to the one hundred and one seamen sent to England in His Majesty's ship Regulus, what I originally stated to you, to wit, that three of them were considered British subjects, fifteen had been twice taken in arms prior to their exchange, and the other remaining eighty-three sent home under the character of American prisoners of war, without any allegation against them, appears to be correct. The motives for sending these eighty-three seamen to Great Britain are fully stated to me in Lieutenant Miller's letter of the 24th of November, an extract of which is enclosed in my letter of this date. The cause therein stated I confidently hope will be satisfactory to you, especially as the health, comfort, and convenience of the prisoners are the primary objects. To the same causes, I beg leave to add, you are to attribute the subsequent transmission of American prisoners.

The preceding statement of facts, I trust, will prove satisfactory to you with respect to ninety-eight of the one hundred and one seamen sent to England, and induce your Government to order the release of a similar number of British maritime prisoners, now confined under retaliatory orders, for them. As to the fifty-nine soldiers and three seamen, American prisoners, sent to Great Britain as subjects of His Majesty, and the corresponding number of British soldiers and seamen held in close confinement for them, I shall make no other remark than this, that the measures the American Government may think proper to adopt will never prevent His Majesty's exercising a right acknowledged by all civilized nations, with the exception of these States.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

THOMAS BARCLAY.

Colonel Thomas Barclay to General Mason.

HARLEM, December 15, 1813.

SIR: From my letters to you of the 9th current, with the documents which accompanied them, you will perceive that the sixteen persons originally represented by Mr. Mitchell as having been confined in very improper places in the jail at Halifax, have, in consequence, (much to their regret, as Mr. Mitchell himself states,) been restored to their original place of confinement with the ordinary American prisoners. You will also notice that eighty-three out of the one hundred and one seamen now on their way to England in His Majesty's ship Regulus, were sent thither from motives of humanity and accommodation, equally applicable to themselves and those who remained in Halifax after their departure. The fifteen others of the one hundred and one seamen so sent come equally under this description. I allude to those twice taken in arms prior to being exchanged; although they may not be so readily exchanged as ordinary prisoners, still they will be placed with and receive the same treatment. There remains, in my opinion, therefore, out of the one hundred and one men, but three, on whom, with any plea for improper treatment, the retaliatory system can be exercised.

I beg leave to request that you will please inform me whether you have, in consequence of my above-mentioned letters to you, directed the release of the sixteen British prisoners put in dungeons, &c.; and, also, whether you have restored to their former situation ninety-eight of the one hundred and one British seamen placed in strict confinement, under the impression that the same number of Americans sent to England were claimed as British subjects, and sent there for trial; and if you have not already ordered their release from strict confinement, whether you intend doing it? This is a subject which does not admit of delay. I am, therefore, under the necessity of requesting a speedy answer.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS BARCLAY.

General MASON, &c.

General Mason to James Prince, Esq., Marshal of Massachusetts, dated

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Dec. 22, 1813.

SIR: Colonel Barclay having given me assurances that the ten petty officers and seamen of the Chesapeake have been taken from the dungeons or cells in which they were confined at Halifax, and placed in close confinement in a situation more conformable to that used for prisoners generally, you will be pleased, on the receipt of this letter, to remove the ten petty officers and seamen, British prisoners, you had confined in retaliation for them from their dungeons or cells, and to place them elsewhere in close confinement, in the same manner as done towards the British prisoners before held in retaliation, where the place of confinement was used to hold safe, and not to inflict further severity.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES PRINCE, Esq., J. MASON.
Marshal of Massachusetts.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Colonel Barclay, dated

DECEMBER 22, 1813.

You will recollect, sir, that I apprized you that, at some short date after Mr. Mitchell's communication to me of the 3d of September, he informed me that the six officers of privateers had been removed to an upper room, and that I had immediately, on receiving this information, directed the six British officers of privateers confined in retaliation to be placed in a similar situation. On your information that the ten petty officers and seamen have been now withdrawn from their former place of confinement, I have directed the Marshal of Massachusetts in the same way to ameliorate the condition of the ten persons confined in retaliation for them.

DECEMBER 22, 1813.

I have received your letter of the 9th instant, relative to the manner of confinement of our sixteen maritime officers and seamen at Halifax, respecting which I had the honor to address you on the 22d September last, and to the communications of Mr. Mitchell, our agent at that place, in which I founded my facts, I find the following results in this: that he calls the places of their confinement dungeons; your informants call them cells, being two-thirds under ground; and that they state that the floor of each dungeon or cell was larger by two feet one way, and by eight inches the other, than he had made them; and, as to light and air, they insist that the prisoners received more by seven inches in a two-foot window than he represented; and, moreover, that there was a hole in the door of nine inches square, which he omitted altogether to mention. As to the accommodation of passage room for the seamen, placing the officers in an upper room, and the permission to walk in the yard, &c., you will please to remark, that your informants do not say that these indulgences were given on the first confinement, and that Mr. Mitchell wrote on the 3d of September, immediately after it took place. Had you, sir, have attentively compared the circumstances, and have collated my remarks of the 22d of September, which you have been at the pains of returning to me in an extract, with the statements of your own officers, I cannot believe you would have seen any cause for approbating their measures in the manner your letter seems to convey. Admit the miserable surplusage of the few feet and inches on which they insist for the subterranean floors and scanty apertures of these by two-thirds under ground cells, into which, in some five, and in others six of our unfortunate citizens were thrust, and I do yet aver that they were, in the fullest sense of the terms, "noisome holes," and "dark and impure receptacles of wretchedness," such as I am exceedingly glad to hear, on your representation, our prisoners have been removed from; and such as I hope your humanity will so interfere with the proper authorities of your Government as henceforward to keep others from being consigned to.

You will recollect, sir, that I apprized you that at some short date after Mr. Mitchell's communication to me of the 3d of September, he informed me that the six officers of privateers had been removed to an upper room, and that I had, immediately on receiving this information, directed the six British officers of privateers, confined in retaliation, to be placed in a similar situation. On your information that the ten petty officers and seamen have been now withdrawn from their former place of confinement, I have directed the Marshal of Massachusetts, in the same way, to ameliorate the condition of the ten persons confined in retaliation for them.

I regretted to see, and I confess I do not comprehend the point of the sarcasm you no doubt intended to convey in the following passage of your letter: "The prisoners, from Mr. Mitchell's account, appear to regret the 'dark and impure receptacles of wretchedness' they have left, which they prefer to the pleasant, healthy, and comfortable island on which they are now confined; for this exchange they are wholly indebted to Mr. Mitchell." Poor unfortunate men! it would seem that it was enough that they had to submit to debasement and suffering of the severest kind, without being made the subjects of taunting paragraphs in official communication. The only consolation I have is, the perfect conviction that their country will not desert them; that it will follow their fate with a watchful eye; and that, painful as it may be to humanity, measure for measure will be dealt out, let that fate be what it may.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Dec. 30, 1813.

SIR: I am now to reply to your letters of the 9th and 15th of this month, respecting the fifty-nine American soldiers, and the one hundred and one American seamen, prisoners of war, sent from Halifax to England in the latter part of last Summer, on whose subject I remonstrated with you on the 22d of September, and relative to whom I took occasion to make some remarks in my letters of the 9th October and 23d November.

In your replies of the 30th November, you are pleased to speak of some of my expressions, in relation to the manner of treatment, and on returning the fifty-nine soldiers, as harsh; if my remarks were founded in truth, however they may have borne on your officers, I am persuaded you will, on duly considering the subject, receive them in the spirit in which they were intended, as designated to call directly to your attention, for the information of your Government, in a case of such serious import, a disingenuous procedure, ill becoming the agents of your nation, towards these defenceless and passive captives. In your communication to me of the 9th instant, in which you transmit the third list received of these men, (all of the three emanating from Lieutenant Miller, your agent for prisoners of war at Halifax; the first transmitted through your agent, Mr. Mitchell, on the 1st September, and the second by you on the 1st October,) you represent it as reconciling the contradiction between the other two which I had pointed out to you, and describe that first sent me by you thus: "An ordinary list to account for alterations since his (Lieutenant Miller's) last return of prisoners, and not to designate the cause of these men being sent; he was, therefore, under no obligation to be particular in describing the cause; indeed, it would have been incorrect in him to have stated the particulars in a common monthly list, intended merely to account for alterations during the month." I send you, sir, a copy of the first list given out by Mr. Miller to Mr. Mitchell, and a copy of his letter of the 1st September which enclosed it. I pray you to compare this with the two furnished you, and by you sent me; you will immediately perceive that no contradiction is reconciled; indeed, it is rather increased. In the list furnished you he goes back nearly to the ground first taken, in description of the men with Mr. Mitchell, namely, that they had given themselves up as British subjects; or, in other words, that fifty-nine men had all informed, each against himself, as to the crime, be that what it may, of which your officers accused them, and for which, as I learn from you, and of which they must have been apprized before they "gave themselves up," they are to be tried for their lives. In the second (the first sent you) this ground is abandoned, and he takes a new one, not as to part of the men, as I was impressed when I first had occasion to animadvert on it to you, but as I find, on a stricter examination, as to every man, that they are deserters from the British service; and so plainly is this designated, that in the return he heads a column—"Name of the British regiment to which they belonged," and in this column is inserted against each man's name the number of a regiment, as first, fifth, sixth, and fourteenth; and you will find, sir, on recurring to your letter of the first October, that, taking this for authority, you remark to me, "you will perceive that the fifty-nine soldiers are deserters from His Majesty's service, and the name of the regiment to which each of them belonged placed opposite their names." I will certainly not undertake to determine what are the forms used for ordinary or extraordinary purposes made to you, but I will say, that if the fact of desertion existed, in a return showing cause why the men implicated were sent for trial, it would hardly have been withdrawn; and if it did not exist, it should never have been charged. In your last letter on this subject, you inform me that you are doubtful whether the number of the regiment shown in the return then sent, which I find precisely the same, and as to the same men, was the number of the British or American regiment. I can resolve that doubt now. These are the American regiments, or parts of regiments, engaged on the 24th June at the Beaver Dams, the time and place which the first return sent by you (by far the most detailed and particular of the three) designates; the fourteenth, from which most of the men were drawn, was commanded by Colonel Boerstler, made prisoner in that action, and lately returned on parole; and most of them are personally known to him.

Under the circumstances I have detailed, I must believe, sir, that you will see sufficient cause for the dissatisfaction of this Government with any explanation given for the sending off these fifty-nine men, to be tried in England or elsewhere.

I am entirely at a loss to know what analogy you have been able to find between the case of the two Frenchmen taken last Summer in British service, and discharged in Richmond, and that of these fifty-nine American soldiers. In the case of the Frenchmen their allegation was, that they were not, of right, prisoners of war, and they petitioned for their liberty. They were publicly examined and set at liberty. In the case of our soldiers the question is not that of liberty, to which we have yielded, but of death, which you threaten.

I can confidently assure you, sir, that it will never be made cause of complaint against your Government, that it set at liberty, at his own request, any prisoner taken in our service, whether he be a native or foreigner.

As it regards the one hundred and one American seamen sent to England in September last, you say that three were supposed to be British subjects; fifteen had been twice taken in arms; and eighty-three were sent, from the explanation given by Lieutenant Miller to you in his letter of the 24th of November, which you send, because some had endeavored to effect their escape; some had shown a mutinous disposition; other prisoners were expected from Quebec, by which means the prison would have been crowded; the weather was hot, and the small-pox was prevalent; and that you confidently hope that these reasons will be satisfactory; the health, comfort, and convenience of the prisoners were the primary objects. Certainly these are primary objects, and it would give great satisfaction to this Government if they could see them consulted by your officers; but how was the convenience and comfort of our prisoners consulted, when a certain number of them are sent off from Halifax, crowded on board ship, beyond sea, to a distance from the facility of exchange, to make room for another number, to be in like manner sent by General Prevost from Quebec, at which place, as you have agreed with me, they should have remained to be exchanged on the land lines? And how was their health consulted as to the prevalence of the small-pox, when vaccination presented so easy and simple a remedy, compared with the risk of carrying the variolous infection into a voyage, in a crowded prison-ship, across the ocean? When men are taken a second time in war without exchange, it is a matter easily capable of proof, and, unless proved, ought not to be acted on; the proof, when had, should be exhibited. None such has, although you have informed me you have made inquiry, yet been exhibited. As to the fifteen men reported by your agent as so situated, whenever it is produced, the corresponding number of your prisoners held for them will be placed in the ordinary state of prisoners; until then they must be retained in the situation in which they now are. The eighty-three British seamen held against the eighty-three American seamen sent to England from Halifax, against whom you inform me there is no charge, will be returned to the ordinary state of non-paroled prisoners, but they will be withheld from exchange until the corresponding American seamen are exchanged or returned to the American station, from which they ought not to have been removed. I have, &c.

J. MASON.

Col. THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

HARLEM, December 27, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you copies of lists of American prisoners of war, sent from Halifax to England in November last, by order of his Excellency Admiral Sir John B. Warren, in His Majesty's ships Nemesis, Diomedes, and Diadem, in consequence of the prison at Halifax being sickly and crowded with prisoners.

I am, sir, your obedient, humble servant,

THOMAS BARCLAY.

General MASON.

Note by the Commissary General of Prisoners.

The list above-mentioned gives the names of one hundred maritime prisoners, officers and seamen, and fifty military prisoners, officers and privates, sent to England in the Nemesis; one hundred and twenty-four maritime prisoners, officers and seamen, and seventy-seven military prisoners, officers and privates, sent to England in the Diomedes; and fifty military prisoners, non-commissioned officers, and privates, sent to England in the Diadem.

Making the whole number four-hundred and one.

HARLEM, Dec. 31, 1813.

SIR: Your letter of the 22d current, in answer to mine of the 9th, I have received. I really expected, when I enclosed you copies of the letters received from Lieutenant Miller, and the copy of Mr. Mitchell's letter to him, you would have been convinced that Mr. Mitchell had too highly colored his description of the rooms in which the sixteen prisoners were confined in the jail at Halifax. This, however, appears not to be the case; on the contrary, you retain the same opinion, and even consider an error on the part of that gentleman of more than a fifth part of the area of the rooms too trifling to be noticed by you or me.

You cannot be ignorant of the situation of Melville island, near Halifax, where prisoners of war are confined, or of the prison, prison-ship, and hospital there. It is admitted, by all who have visited them, to be equal to any similar establishments of the same extent in Europe. No complaint, I believe, has been made against it, or the treatment which the prisoners receive there. In this prison, ten at least, and perhaps the whole of the sixteen prisoners were confined at the time they were moved to the town jail of Halifax; in which jail they remained several weeks, until the time they were again removed to their former confinement on Melville island, in consequence of Mr. Mitchell's representation to you that the rooms in which they were confined in the jail at Halifax were dungeons, dark and impure receptacles of wretchedness, where the prisoners were only permitted to receive the means of respiration and the light of heaven through an iron-barred aperture. Lieutenant Miller has declared that this statement of Mr. Mitchell's is incorrect, and that the rooms in the jail in which the sixteen prisoners were placed, instead of being dark and impure, were good and comfortable, and in every respect befitting prisoners of war, and that the prisoners were satisfied with them, and with the treatment they received while in jail. In proof of his assertion, I enclosed you not only a copy of Mr. Mitchell's letter to Lieutenant Miller, in which he acknowledges the men preferred the jail to Melville island, but also a letter from the Sheriff of Halifax, in which he states "that the apartments allotted to them (the prisoners) were in every respect suitable, and sufficiently large and well ventilated, and every possible indulgence granted to them, consistent with their situation. That when they understood they were to return to Melville island, they expressed their sorrow at being removed, and acknowledged in my presence the indulgence which they had received from the jailer and his family," Possessed of the testimony of the Sheriff of Halifax, and of the acknowledgment of the prisoners, (under Mr. Mitchell's hand,) "that their removal from Halifax jail to the prison of Melville island was not for the better," I am at a loss to account for adhering to Mr. Mitchell's original account of the rooms, and still more so for your expressing yourself in your letter of the 22d instant in the words following: "I do yet aver, that they (the rooms) were, in the fullest sense of the terms, noisome holes, and dark and impure receptacles of wretchedness."

I wish to be informed on what evidence you found your opinion; not on what the prisoners say, for Mr. Mitchell himself has acknowledged in his letter to Mr. Miller, that they told him they preferred the jail to the prison-ship at Melville island; nor can you rest it on Mr. Mitchell's description; first, because it is proved to be incorrect as to dimensions, light, and air; and secondly, because he has acknowledged the prisoners regretted being removed from the jail. Will you, sir, say you oppose the dictum of Mr. Mitchell to the assurance of Lieutenant Miller, the declaration of the Sheriff of Halifax, and the concurrent voice of the sixteen prisoners? If not, pray acquaint me on what authority it is that you speak with so much confidence? Do you recollect that, by your confirming Mr. Mitchell's description, you, in express terms, stultify the six officers and ten men who were confined in the jail; for none but fools or maniacs would prefer noisome holes and dark and impure receptacles of wretchedness, to the prison-ship at Melville island, the dimensions and other particulars of which I sent you.

The truth, sir, is, that both the prison-ship, and the rooms allotted to the sixteen American prisoners in the jail at Halifax, were comfortable places of confinement; and the reason why the prisoners preferred the latter to the former was this: At Melville island there were upwards of one thousand six hundred prisoners; consequently, the keepers and other attendants had it not in their power to pay attention and civility to each individual; whereas, in the jail there were only sixteen prisoners, to whom the jailer and his family showed every indulgence, as the prisoners acknowledged to the sheriff. If the rooms in the jail were as described by Mr. Mitchell, is it possible the prisoners would have regretted leaving them?

You are under a mistake in supposing I intended anything sarcastic, or in a taunting manner to jest with the feelings or the situation of these prisoners. Give me leave to tell you, sir, that I am incapable of such an act, and that it ill comports with you even to insinuate it of me. I feel as much, and would go as far to serve these unfortunate men, as you or any other gentleman. My remarks are pointed to Mr. Mitchell, and not to the prisoners; for it was my wish to use their testimony to prove the incorrectness of the character given by Mr. Mitchell of the rooms in which they had been confined, and I assure you I approve of what they have done and said.

In my letter of the 9th instant I remarked, and again repeat, that the prisoners are wholly indebted to Mr. Mitchell for being removed, contrary to their wishes, from the jail in Halifax to the prison-ship at Melville island.

When you communicated to me in September Mr. Mitchell's description of the dungeons, cells, or rooms, (it is of no moment what appellations are given to them, for names cannot change realities,) into which the sixteen prisoners were placed, I transmitted, without delay, a copy of your letter to the Admiral at Halifax, and requested an explanation, and at the same time desired, if the facts were as represented by Mr. Mitchell, that an amelioration of the treatment towards the prisoners might take place. On the receipt of my letter, the Admiral, in order to remove even the shadow of complaint, directed that the sixteen prisoners should be returned to the prison-ship at Melville island. If Mr. Mitchell had not given you this horrid description of the places in the jail where those prisoners were confined, I take it for granted you would not have remonstrated to me against them, nor should I have written to the Admiral on the subject; the prisoners, therefore, would have remained in the jail probably until they were exchanged or released on parole. This being the case, I am authorized to say Mr. Mitchell was the cause of their being removed, contrary to their wishes, from the jail on board the prison-ship.

As these men are now in their pristine situation as prisoners, I request you will be pleased to inform me whether the sixteen British prisoners, placed by your order in more than ordinary strict confinement by the marshal of Massachusetts, by way of retaliation for the sixteen Americans, have been restored to their original situation as prisoners.

OFFICE COMM'Y GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Jan. 15, 1814.

SIR: I received, in due course of mail, your letter of the 27th December, and the lists enclosed, whereby I am informed that four hundred and one of our prisoners, officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the Army, and officers and crews of private armed vessels, have been sent to England from Halifax, on the plea of a crowded and sickly prison at Halifax. It appears to be in vain to remonstrate longer against measures which your officers seem determined to take, in relation to our prisoners, without regard to individual suffering, or to the convention between the two nations, as to stations of exchange. That a single prison might be crowded by the increase of prisoners at a station, and sickly in consequence of that crowding, is probable enough; but unless it was shown that the country in which that station is was sickly, there can be no pretension to humane motives for such a removal; other prison-houses or prison-ships should have been supplied. This, sir, as in the case of the last removal to England, is regarded as a measure replete with cruelty to the unfortunate prisoners concerned, and will, in due time, be met by a corresponding measure towards your prisoners in our possession.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MASON.

Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Thomas Barclay to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated

JANUARY 24, 1814.

SIR: Your letter of the 15th January, in answer to mine of the 27th December, I have had the honor to receive.

I am inclined to believe you are under a mistake in supposing it to be an unjustifiable act to send American prisoners of war from Canada, Nova Scotia, or the West Indies, to England for safe keeping; and I am of opinion you will find that all persons acquainted with the laws of nations will agree, that the answer "that the prisoners sent to Great Britain for that purpose" is conclusive, and ought to be satisfactory. When, in addition to these remarks, you are furnished with the additional reasons stated in Port Admiral Griffith's letter, a copy whereof is enclosed, that the prisoners were removed from Halifax to Great Britain in consequence of the prisons being crowded, and the men sickly, every objection to their removal I hope will cease. From your letter, it however appears you consider that "other prison-houses and prison-ships should have been supplied." This measure, perhaps, was not convenient; at all events it would be attended with an expense which the Admiral probably considered he was not authorized to incur. In England there are ample prisons; and I have reasons to believe, from Lieutenant Miller's representations of the sufferings your prisoners have experienced in Nova Scotia from want of clothing, that they will, on their arrival in England, have reason to rejoice being under the care of Mr. Beasley, who will supply them with what is necessary.

I am at a loss to comprehend what you intend by remarking, "without regard to the convention between the two nations as to stations for exchange," because Liverpool or Falmouth, in England, are as much stations for exchange as Quebec or Halifax.

Extract of a letter from Rear Admiral Griffith to Colonel Thomas Barclay, dated

ON BOARD THE CENTURION,

HALIFAX, December 19, 1813.

By an order from the Admiralty to Sir John Warren, which he has left with me, he is directed not to allow any more American prisoners to be released till the balance in our favor should be considerably reduced, and the order is accompanied by a return of the exchanges made in England, where alone the balance in our favor amounted to upwards of one thousand.

I would beg of you to inform me, as particularly as you can, respecting the mode of confinement and treatment of the British officers put into close confinement in the United States, that a similar measure of indulgence or severity may be exercised on the American officers confined here by way of retaliation. And I would take the liberty of suggesting to you the necessity of endeavoring to remove the impression of our having sent American prisoners to England on suspicion of their being British born subjects. The American Government can have no right to assume this as a fact. As far as relates to prisoners sent from hence to England, we have never avowed or acknowledged any such motive, with the exception of those who have been particularly designated as such.

The crowded state of the prison at Melville island, where double the number of prisoners were confined to that it was ever intended to have held, the difficulty, if not impossibility, of finding adequate security for them anywhere else, and the suspension of the exchange by the American Government, were sufficient excuses (if it were necessary to offer any) for sending some of the prisoners to England. I shall, however, stop sending any more till I hear from you; but if the exchange is again interrupted, we must thin off by every opportunity, for there are a great many more, even now, in this place, than there ought to be.

Extract of letter from Lieutenant William Miller, British agent for prisoners of war at Halifax, to Colonel Barclay, dated

DECEMBER 20, 1813.

In consequence of your letter by the Analostan, that the Government of the United States had put into close confinement one hundred and seventy-six British prisoners of war, in various parts of the United States, in retaliation, I have been directed to confine the same number of American prisoners of war on board the Magnet prison-ship; and on the receipt of your last despatches of the 24th November to Lieutenant General Sherbrooke, wherein you state that forty-six British officers were also closely confined, I was directed to arrest the whole of the American officers on parole, seventy-two in number, and confine them on board the Malabar transport, lately returned from Quebec, by removing some of the soldiers to Melville island. I fitted up a large space from the mainmast, abaft, thirty feet long, twenty-two feet broad, and seven feet high, for their temporary accommodation, and I was directed to complete, or double that number, to ninety-two; but, on reconsideration, Sir John Sherbrooke and Rear Admiral Griffith thought proper to alter the arrangement, and permit the maritime officers selected by Mr. Mitchell to depart in the Analostan in such numbers as made up the equivalent rank of two hundred and fourteen.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

In the number confined on board the Magnet prison ship, I have selected as follows: for the twenty-one seamen of the Dominica, confined at Charleston, I have taken twenty-one men belonging to the United States' gun-vessel No. 121, and for the seven seamen of the Tenedos, and eight of the Boxer, I have confined fifteen of the Chesapeake. It will be very necessary, if I could be furnished with the names of the British officers and seamen confined in retaliation, that I might make a regular entry of them. (I have received the lists of the one hundred and one and the sixteen confined.) I have liberated the seamen of the Chesapeake, as per abstract, for the two seamen of the Dragon. You will be pleased to observe I sent four of those sixteen, confined in retaliation, to England on the 19th ultimo, as per abstract, which reduces the number in my custody to eight, although I still consider them on my list; and in consequence of the ill state of health of James Trask, late sailing-master of the Revenge privateer, I have sent him in the Analostan, but shall confine another in lieu, which leaves Thomas Swain, of the Wiley Reynard, and two warrant officers, and four seamen of the Chesapeake.

JANUARY 31, 1814.

SIR: On recurring to your letter of the 31st December, in reply to mine of the 22d of the same month, unwilling as I am to spin out discussions of an irritable character, I find it necessary to make some remarks on it.

As I have had, in other instances, occasion to do, I must now again express my regret, that you do not consider with more attention the papers in the case than it does seem you are accustomed to do, previous to entering on a discussion of their merits; had you, with more care, examined the letters and statements bearing on this case, you might have saved some trouble to you and myself, and probably have spared the necessity you appear to have imposed on yourself, of conducting your argument in terms little fitted to conviction.

Most certainly while Mr. Mitchell, our agent for prisoners at Halifax, continues to be thought by this Government worthy of remaining in the office which it has conferred on him, I shall consider all that comes from him as well worthy of faith as anything which may be stated by your agent for prisoners; and I shall, in justice to him and to the Government, repel any attempt, from whatever quarter it may come, unaccompanied by proofs, to lessen his credibility. If, however, you had attended to my communication of the 22d December, you would have seen that I by no means proceeded on his statement alone; that I had carefully collated that with the declaration of your agents, and shown the result. I took, finally, the description of the places of confinement for our sixteen unfortunate prisoners, given by your agents themselves, and indisposed to graduate human misery as it were by a scale, and revolting at the idea of looking for comfort in such incarceration, did then say, as I now say, that an allotment of subterraneous floor, eleven feet one way, by seven feet eight inches the other; height, from floor to ceiling, (two-thirds of which under ground,) seven feet four inches; windows, or places for admission of light and air, two, one nine inch square, the other twenty-four by seventeen inches, is, in the fullest sense of the term, "a noisome hole, and a dark and impure receptacle of wretchedness:" in which sentiment I am abundantly confident I shall be joined by the whole civilized world, with exceptions too few in any degree to impair its correctness; and these are the precise dimensions and descriptions given by Lieutenant Miller, and the Sheriff of Halifax, and your private friend, of the cells or dungeons into which were put, and kept for some days, sixteen American citizens, officers and seamen, maritime prisoners of war—six in one, and five in each of the two others.

It is distinctly to be remembered, that it was of this period, and of this manner of confinement, of which Mr. Mitchell first reported and complained, and respecting which I immediately remonstrated with you. It is therefore vain to confound, by description of passages and yards to which these prisoners might afterwards have had access, what first existed in relation to them, with what took place when their situation was in some degree ameliorated. You are well aware, sir, that Mr. Mitchell did report this amelioration, and that a corresponding relaxation toward those of your prisoners held in retaliation for them was immediately ordered; and that this amelioration was made some time before they were removed to Melville island. It was then with the second stage of confinement that the situation of our sixteen prisoners, when carried to that island, is to be compared; which circumstance, when taken into consideration with the facts stated then and since by yourself, that there they were crowded in with sixteen hundred of their unfortunate countrymen, will sufficiently explain their preference, if such they had, to the prison in Halifax. I was glad to hear from you that, in the passage to which I alluded, as presumed to have been intended to convey a sarcasm on this preference attributed to our unfortunate prisoners, you did not mean to sport with their feelings. Difficult as it is to be understood in ordinary construction, I am willing to accept your explanation as to them; and you will permit me to remark, sir, should have been quite as much disposed to do so, had it been given in terms more becoming the occasion.

Colonel Barclay to General Mason.

HARLEM, February 6, 1814.

SIR: I have by this day's post had the honor to receive your letter of the 31st January. I have attentively examined my letter to you of the 31st December, and cannot discover anything in it improper or necessary to be corrected. I regret you consider it "little fitted to conviction." Perhaps, were your letter and mine on the subject submitted to impartial persons, they would differ in opinion with you.

I shall not travel the ground already gone over in my reply to your letter of the 22d December, because mine of the 31st of that month is as full an answer to your letter of the 31st January as it was to that of the 22d December. I request, therefore, you will be pleased to receive it as such, and that you will give it the construction which the arguments and expressions merit.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
THOMAS BARCLAY.

Extract of a letter from the Hon. Ebenezer Sage to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated SAG HARBOR, LONG ISLAND,
September 28, 1813.

As it may be within the province of your official duties, I will trouble you with the following case:

A few weeks since, a barge and nine men from the British squadron (which lies in Gardner's bay, within sight of this port) came on shore in the night, a short distance from this, and took from his bed a Joshua Penny, and, without permitting him to put on his hat or clothing, carried him on board the Ramilies, where he was put in irons and on short allowance, and in that condition sent off in the ship to Halifax, or elsewhere. You have probably seen, in the newspapers, the correspondence between the commanding officer of this port and Hardy, in which the former, the next day after the capture, demanded him as a non-combatant, and the latter refused to restore him, upon the plea that he had acted as a pilot to Commodore Decatur's barges, and the torpedo boat, and was on the books of Decatur's frigate, at forty dollars per month. That he acted as pilot in both the above cases is true, but the last charge is not true. He was hired as a pilot, and is on the books of no ship, or attached to any public service. The British Commodore further declares in his communication that he holds him as a spy, in consequence of his being on board his ship at a certain time to sell clams. If this act makes him punishable as a spy, the Commodore must be surrounded with spies every day, from Connecticut and elsewhere, with beef, breadstuff, onions, fruit, and eatables of all kinds, as we know his fleet is continually surrounded with traders. The question is, can this man be held as a prisoner of war, and held in irons? Is it not a case demanding the lex talionis?

Penny is a poor but industrious man, with a large family; a good seaman and pilot, and of a bold and daring spirit; has faced danger, and endured much hardship in almost every quarter of the world. It is a fact, that an American, who was on board the ship as a trader, put on the uniform of a lieutenant, and accompanied a crew to point out to them the place of Penny's abode, the day preceding the night in which he was taken. This we learn from some prisoners who have since been liberated, and from whom we also learn the circumstance of this confinement in irons, &c.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Stephen Decatur to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

U. S. SHIP UNITED STATES,
NEAR NEW LONDON, Oct. 6, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo.

I saw Sir Thomas Hardy's statement relating to Penny, in the newspapers, and had from the collector of Sag Harbor many of the particulars of his capture and subsequent treatment, who informed me that he should communicate the same facts to the Government, and for that reason I omitted doing it myself, as unnecessary.

Penny was never entered on the books of this ship in any capacity; nor ever employed by me but for the purpose of piloting our boats in the expedition to Gardner's island; and then he acted merely as a pilot; went, and continued during the expedition, unarmed, and received for his compensation the ordinary pilotage.

OFFICE COMM'Y GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Nov. 1, 1813.

SIR: I am commanded by the President to direct that you will, with as little delay as possible after the reception of this order, place in confinement, such as will preclude the possibility of escape, William Mayton, a British subject, and prisoner of war, late master's mate of the British ship of war Ramilies, and recently transferred, among other prisoners, to your custody by the Marshal of Connecticut, there to be held as a hostage, to answer for the safety and proper treatment of Joshua Penny, a citizen of New York, lately seized at night in his bed, at his own house, near Sag Harbor, Long Island, by a detachment from the British squadron in that quarter, carried on board, and yet held in rigid confinement by the enemy. It is not intended, for the present at least, that the unfortunate person so confined, shall be barred from such decent accommodation and comfortable subsistence as his situation may admit of, and you are requested to inform him fully of the cause by which this measure has been made necessary.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

J. MASON.
Marshal of Rhode Island.

Extract of a letter from R. Swanton to the Secretary of State, dated

NEW YORK, November 8, 1813.

SIR: I am informed, by letters written in Halifax, in July, August, and September last, that my brother, John Swanton, lately serving in the capacity of captain of marines on board the private armed schooner Globe, of Baltimore, Captain Moon, commander, was captured on the 29th May in the brig Endeavor, prize to the Globe.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

And Mr. Mitchell, agent for prisoners of war, in his letter of the 4th September, says that my brother was then confined on board His Britannic Majesty's ship Melpomene, and about to be sent in her to England, for the purpose of trial as a British subject.

I therefore presume that he is now in England, and that he either has or will be proceeded against. I am informed that Mr. Mitchell has laid his case before the Government; and my anxiety induces me to trouble you with this communication, and to request you to inform me whether anything can be done for him.

ON BOARD H. M. SHIP CENTURION,
Halifax, July 14, 1813.

DEAR ROBERT: I have not time, at this moment, to enter more particularly into the occurrences that took place on board the Globe, than that the captain thought proper to send me a passenger to the United States in the brig Endeavor, captured by us, off the Rock of Lisbon, on the 20th March last, and was recaptured off Cape Henry, 29th May, by His Majesty's ship Le Fantome, Captain Lawrence, who detained me, in particular, under pretence of being a British subject. He took me with him to Bermuda, where I underwent a formal examination, which was committed to paper, as follows: Where were you born? Kilcat, county Kilkenny, Ireland. When did you leave it? In 1789. How old are you? Thirty-eight years. Have you lived seven years in the United States of America? Yes, above three times that, and am a citizen in right of my father, who lived and possessed property in America before the Revolution. Have you a vote? Yes, and voted for Mr. Madison, in opposition to Mr. Clinton. Are you a married man? Yes, and have five children. This is, as well as I can recollect, the substance of the examination. I was conveyed from that island to this port, and write to you in irons; nor do I know by what means I could have informed you of my situation, had it not been for the kindness of the commander of this ship, who permits me to write to Mr. Mitchell, agent for prisoners of war. I therefore request you to act immediately as the law directs in such cases, and write me an answer, sending me at the same time two hundred dollars. Remember me to our relations and friends in New York, and inform my wife in Pennsylvania, to whom it will be a sad stroke.

I impatiently wait your answer, and remain your loving brother,
J. SWANTON.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Dec. 17, 1813.

SIR: I am commanded by the President to direct that you will, with as little delay as possible after the reception of this order, place in close confinement, such as will preclude the possibility of escape, William Lincoln, a British subject, and prisoner of war, late mate of the merchant brig Fly, there to be held as a hostage, to answer for the safety of John Swanton, late a captain of marines on board the privateer Globe of Baltimore, who has been unjustifiably confined by the British Government at Halifax, and sent from thence to England for trial.

It is not intended, for the present at least, that the unfortunate person so confined shall be barred from such decent accommodation as his situation may admit of; and you are requested to inform him fully of the cause by which this measure has been made necessary.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

J. MASON.

EBENEZER K. DEXTER, Esq.,
Marshal of Rhode Island.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, Jan. 2, 1814.

SIR: I enclose you a letter from Mr. R. Swanton of New York, a very respectable citizen, to his brother, Mr. John Swanton, late a captain of marines on board the private armed schooner Globe of Baltimore, Captain Moon, captured in a prize of that vessel, and sent into Halifax, and thence in close confinement on board one of the British ships of war, in the month of September last, to England for trial, on pretext of being a British subject.

It is desirable to afford the friends of persons thus unfortunately situated every means of communicating with them as far as may depend on the public agents; you will, therefore, be pleased to endeavor to find out the place of confinement of Mr. Swanton, and convey to him the letter intended for him, and the pecuniary relief afforded by his brother, with any other you may be able to give him.

An officer of a British merchant ship, corresponding with him in rank, has been confined here, to answer, in his person, for his safety and proper treatment. I am informed by Mr. Swanton's family, and have no doubt of the facts, that, although born in Ireland, he came here very young, and is a citizen of the United States in the right of his father, who came to this country before the peace of 1783, and has habitually resided here since, until his death a few years ago.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

J. MASON.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Isaac Chauncey to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

U. S. SHIP GENERAL PIKE,
SACKETT'S HARBOR, Oct. 12, 1813.

On the 24th of August last, I wrote to Commodore Sir James L. Yeo, respecting the detention of Thomas Goldsmith, late a seaman belonging to the Julia, and detained by Commodore Yeo for trial as a British subject. I have this day received his answer to that communication; copies of both letters I have the honor to enclose.

I shall wait your instructions, as to what further measures are to be adopted in regard to Goldsmith.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

U. S. SHIP GENERAL PIKE,
SACKETT'S HARBOR, Aug. 24, 1813.

SIR: The fortune of war having placed the crews of the Growler and Julia (two small schooners belonging to my squadron) in your power, and having understood that Thomas Goldsmith, ordinary seaman, belonging to the late United States' schooner Scourge, and captured in the Julia, has been detained for trial by your order, as a British subject, I will thank you to inform me upon what grounds Goldsmith has been detained, and whether it is your determination to try him in the province, or send him to England. I have the honor to be, &c.,

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

Com. Sir JAMES LUCAS YEO, Kt.,
Commanding H. B. M. naval forces, &c.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Sir James L. Yeo to Commodore Isaac Chauncey, dated

ON BOARD THE WOLFE, AT KINGSTON,
October 11, 1813.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 24th August on my arrival at this port, requesting I would inform you upon what grounds Goldsmith has been detained.

In answer to which, I have to acquaint you that the man himself acknowledges his being by birth and parentage a subject of Great Britain; but as to whether he will be tried for serving under the flag of his country's foes in this place, or in England, I cannot inform you.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to James Prince, Esq., Marshal of Massachusetts, dated

DECEMBER 18, 1813.

SIR: I am commanded by the President to instruct you to place immediately in close confinement one of the British seamen in your custody, captured on Lake Ontario, to be held as a hostage to answer for the proper treatment and safety of Thomas Goldsmith, late a seaman belonging to the United States' schooner Julia, unjustifiably detained for trial as a British subject, by order of Commodore Sir James Yeo.

You will inform the person so designated of the cause of this measure, and make his treatment the same as that recommended to you heretofore in similar cases.

Extract of a letter from Thomas Steele, Esq., Deputy Marshal of Ohio, to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated CHILICOTHE, September 18, 1813.

I made a return of one prisoner, who was put into my custody on the 9th of May last, of the name of Thomas Alexander Clark, who was taken at the rapids of the Miami of the Lake. I was instructed by Colonel Campbell that he, the said Clark, was to be kept in close confinement as a hostage for a certain Captain Knaggs of Detroit, which has been done in the jail of the county; common jail fees are twenty-five cents per day. I have furnished him the necessary clothing.

QUEBEC, October 7, 1813.

SIR: Agreeably to my proposition of last evening, I shall give you a statement of facts which is the cause of my confinement, and then leave it for your honor to decide, viz: I was assistant superintendent of Indian affairs, and captain of a militia company in Detroit, Michigan Territory, and was surrendered by General Hull at the capitulation of Detroit, and guaranteed, agreeably to a proclamation issued by General Brock, both in person and property. Shortly after such proclamation, the savages, who, to glut their thirst for blood, hunted me day and night for the purpose of assassinating me if they should find me; finding their search fruitless, they repaired to my dwelling, and robbed me of about twelve thousand dollars in specie and effects. After this had taken place, I was advised, by persons of respectability living on both sides of the river, to leave the country a short time, until the anger of the savages should be assuaged, both for my personal safety and the safety of my wife and children. Agreeably to their advice, I obtained a permit from Colonel Proctor to depart; myself and several others chartered a vessel for the purpose, and moved to Presque Isle; and after that I pursued my route to the States to settle my business, and returned to Pittsburg, and from there was making the best of my way to Detroit to find my family, who were daily exposed to the insults and dangers of the Indians. After I left Pittsburg, I arrived at the Miami rapids. I there, unexpectedly, fell in with a part of General Winchester's army, the other part had advanced to Frenchtown. I continued on from Miami rapids to Frenchtown, where I had a brother living, and put up with him, anxious to reach my family before the army arrived, lest the Indians might suspect I was with it, and massacre my family for retaliation; however, the next day an engagement took place between General Winchester and Colonel Proctor's forces, about two miles from where I was, in which the former had to retreat, and passed by where I was. The Indians finding me at that place, took me and carried me to Colonel Proctor, who said I had broken my parole, and ordered me to be immediately forwarded to Fort George, without any examination. I remained a few days at Fort George, where I obtained a certificate from General Winchester, showing that I had nothing to do with the army; I was then forwarded to Montreal, and then examined before the police, and committed as a prisoner of war; shortly after that, I had assurances of being sent home as soon as the roads would admit, but instead of that I was forwarded to this place, and confined as a prisoner having broken his parole, which I am now ready to show, by General Winchester and his officers, that I was no way concerned with the movements of General Winchester's army, directly or indirectly. An investigation of this affair would be highly gratifying to your obedient servant,

WHITMORE KNAGGS.

Colonel GARDNER.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Barclay to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated

HARLEM, January 8, 1814.

I enclose you an extract of a letter from Captain Chambers, of the forty-first regiment, dated Chillicothe, 27th November, 1813, and beg you will be pleased to give the necessary orders that Mr. Thomas A. Clark, Indian interpreter, with the rank of a subaltern in the British service, now a prisoner in the jail at Chillicothe, either receives the three shillings sterling per day, the allowance for officers, or is supplied with such food as comports with his rank as an officer.

JANUARY 22, 1814.

Mr. Thomas A. Clark, whom you mention, is confined at Chillicothe in retaliation for a Mr. Whitmore Knaggs, an American citizen, confined in jail in Quebec, where Colonel Gardner saw him in his jail, on common prisoner's fare, on the 15th October. Mr. Knaggs is a man of property and respectability; he was an inhabitant of, and captain of the local militia at Detroit; was included in the capitulation of that place, and promised protection in person and property; the Indians were, however, permitted to plunder his house of money and effects to a large amount, and constantly threatened to assassinate him; under these circumstances he obtained permission from General Proctor to go within our lines, which he did in a vessel, with others, to Pennsylvania, leaving his family. After some months, was returning to his family at Detroit, when he was seized by the Indians and carried to General Proctor, who confined him on suspicion of belonging to General Winchester's army, who were engaged about the time and near the place Mr. Knaggs was met on his way to Detroit. He was first sent to Fort George, where he obtained a certificate from General Winchester that he was in no way attached to his army. Mr. Knaggs is kept in the common jail, and, as I understand, on ordinary prisoner's rations. I wrote directly that Mr. Clark be treated in the same way, but that his subsistence be abundant and of the better kind, and his situation shall be ameliorated the moment you will inform me, from an authentic source, that Mr. Knaggs has been; in other words, it is intended that he shall receive, in everything, the treatment Mr. Knaggs receives, and I shall be extremely glad that, on a change in this, I may be enabled to make that of Mr. Clark entirely comfortable.

Captain Jones to the Hon. Paul Hamilton, Secretary of the Navy.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you of my arrival here to-day with the surviving officers and crew of the Wasp, excepting the boatswain, boatswain's mate, eight men, and two boys, who were detained as British subjects, and are now confined on board the prison ship at Bermuda.

Mr. McLeod has been eight or ten years in our service, has a boatswain's warrant, married in Virginia, and has there a wife and children. I do not know where those men may have been born, but the most, if not all, have protections; and, from their having detained two others, who Mr. Rodgers and myself knew to be native citizens, who were afterwards dismissed upon my observing that I knew them to be such, I think it probable that many of the others are natives of the United States. JACOB JONES.

HON. PAUL HAMILTON.

Captain Beresford to Admiral Warren.

HIS MAJESTY'S SHIP POICTIERS,

February 15, 1813.

SIR: In reply to the letter I had the honor to receive from you yesterday, I have the honor to inform you that the men I thought it my duty to detain, until your pleasure was known, are, in my opinion, British subjects. The boatswain, Mr. McLeod, told me he was born in Scotland, but that, having taken the American oath of allegiance, and being married in Philadelphia, he considered himself an American subject; the other men, in my opinion, are English, Scotch, or Irish. I told the officers of the Wasp my suspicions, and that, consequently, it was my intention to detain them, but that, if the captain or any other officer could identify any of them as Americans, I would instantly send them on board the cartel that was then going to New York with the officers and crew of the Wasp.

This they were unable to do, and I, therefore, sent them on board the Ruby to await your pleasure, being perfectly convinced, within my own breast, that they were British subjects, although I am certainly without documents to prove the fact. I have the honor to be, &c.

J. P. BERESFORD.

SIR J. B. WARREN, K. B. Admiral, &c.

Captain Jones to the Secretary of the Navy.

MACEDONIAN, NEW LONDON,

September 15, 1813.

SIR: The enclosed is from one of the twelve of the crew of the Wasp, who were detained after her capture by Captain Beresford on the supposition of their being British subjects.

The case of Mr. McLeod, the boatswain, is peculiarly hard. He was in the service during the war with Tripoli, and has continued so ever since; he has been for several years married to a discreet woman in Virginia, the daughter of a person living about nine miles from Norfolk, and has, or had when he left home, two or three children.

The persons detained were Mr. McLeod, boatswain, the writer of the enclosed, alias John Goldthwait, J. Stevens, boatswain's mate, George M. D. Read, Thomas Phillips, John Rose, a boy, Dennis Dougherty, marine, William Mitchell, Peter Barrow, and John Brooks, boy.

Respectfully, yours, J. JONES.
HON. WILLIAM JONES.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

[Enclosed in the preceding.]
Mr. Goulthrite to Captain Jones.

MELVILLE PRISON, HALIFAX,
August 16, 1813.

Sir: We take the liberty of writing to you to inform you that, on the 18th of June, we were sent out of the Goree prison ship, at Bermuda, on board the Dragon 74 for Halifax, where we arrived after a favorable passage of ten days, and we are sorry to inform you that we are almost naked for want of clothes, having nothing except one shirt and trowsers, and as there is no more prospect of getting clear than there was when we were first taken prisoners, we humbly entreat you that you will send us some relief, as we have applied several times to Mr. Mitchell for some clothes, and we cannot get any; so, without you relieve us, we shall perish for want of clothes here in Winter, as it is very severe.

We remain your most obedient and humble servants,

J. GOULTHRITE, and others.

Captain JONES,

U. S. frigate Macedonian.

P. S. We are sorry to inform you that three died at Bermuda, viz: Peter Barrow, John Rose, and John Stephens.

NOVEMBER 23, 1813.

But, sir, these are not the only cases in which it is plainly shown how the conduct of your officers in seizing and separating our captured men from the ordinary state of prisoners, and subjecting them to long and painful confinement, has stood self-condemned on their own assumed ground. I will instance, among many that might be cited, the cases of five, at least, of the six men of the crew of the Nautilus, the six men of the crew of the privateer Sarah Ann, thus taken, long held, and finally discharged; and the twelve men of the crew of the Wasp, taken and held in like manner, three of whom have fallen a sacrifice to, and during, severe confinement, and the remaining nine, as you have informed me, are at length restored to the ordinary state of prisoners in Halifax for exchange. In this last instance, I refer you, sir, to the letter from Commodore Beresford to Admiral Warren, of which I furnished you a copy, and in which he states explicitly that he had designated and detained them merely on suspicion, and because our officers could not, of their own knowledge, declare that they were native born Americans.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Thomas Barclay to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated

SEPTEMBER 7, 1813.

His Majesty's schooner Dominica, lately captured by an American privateer after a sanguinary conflict, has been carried into Charleston, South Carolina. At the time the letter to me announcing her arrival was written, the marshal had not admitted the officers, midshipmen, and master's mates, &c., to their parole. I am also informed there are some masters of British armed vessels detained on board the prison-ship to whom the indulgence of parole has been refused.

Whether this is correct I do not take upon me to say; but you will do me a favor by ordering the marshal at Charleston to extend the indulgence of paroles to such characters as you think proper, and acquaint me with the extent to which you limit them.

I beg leave, also, to request you will send the necessary orders to the marshal to furnish the British prisoners with comfortable bedding, and the necessary utensils for cooking, &c., as the men of the Dominica were stripped of everything by the crew of the American privateer, who, in every other instance, I am informed, behaved with a barbarity not practised by civilized nations. I do not mention this to you by way of complaint, because my Government will take the necessary measures, if the information is correct, but to afford the American Government an opportunity of investigating the facts, and correcting future acts of barbarity which dishonor human nature. The crew of the American privateer, it is said, were principally blacks and men of color.

OCTOBER 5, 1813.

I have written to the Marshal of South Carolina on the subject of your letter of the 7th of September, and can assure you that everything shall be done there that is requisite to make your prisoners comfortable. As to paroles at that depot, I have no particular information; I have required it, and it shall be, when received, communicated. The practice has been, heretofore, to parole all midshipmen and commissioned officers of men of war, and all master's mates and lieutenants of private armed ships and merchantmen, which I am entirely disposed to continue, if the practice on your side will permit me to do so. I understand that your Government paroles neither mates nor lieutenants, or at most not lower than the first mate, and no master of a privateer under fourteen guns. I request early information from you on this subject, to enable me to determine on the course proper to be taken here.

You state that you are informed that the men of the late British schooner Dominica were stripped of everything by the crew of the capturing American privateer, and, in every instance, treated with a barbarity not practised by civilized nations, and which dishonor human nature. I regret to hear that any of our masters of privateers, who have heretofore been as remarkable for their generosity and kindness to prisoners when subdued, as they have been for their skill and bravery in battle, should be accused of such unpardonable acts. The facts shall be inquired into, and, if they exist, as you suppose they do, you may be assured they will not pass unnoticed by a Government whose constant effort has been to invite by example its enemy to conduct the war in all its branches in the most humane possible manner. Without, at this time, assenting to or denying the facts you suppose to exist, I will remind you that it is said to be difficult to restrain the conquering crew, on a vessel carried by boarding, from acts of cruelty and of pillage; and I trust the same laudable spirit which has excited your feelings on this occasion will cause you to inquire into the conduct of the crew of your frigate Shannon, (when the Chesapeake was carried in that way,) and, above all, will have induced you to have become possessed of, and to have reported to the proper authorities, the facts attending the Anglo-Indian warfare on the Canada lines; since, surely, if any excesses in this life can be most properly termed "barbarities which dishonor human nature," they must be those exhibited on the late occasions on the river Raisin, Brownstown, and elsewhere, when the Indians, in British pay, fighting by the side of British troops, and afterwards thanked in general orders by British officers, were permitted to murder by piecemeal, to hack, to mangle, and to torture unto slow death, and to burn alive, American citizens, their prisoners; and, as if to fill the measure of savage enormity, to expose the bodies of these wretched sufferers to be devoured on the surface by every passing vermin.

These things, sir, have been repeatedly done in the face of the world, and are not to be contradicted. It is to be hoped that you will afford the British Government an opportunity of investigating the facts, and of correcting acts, to the description of which, in adequate terms, no language used by civilized man is equal.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Morton A. Waring, Esq., Marshal of South Carolina, dated

OCTOBER 5, 1813.

I send extracts of a late letter from Colonel Barclay, and of my reply. Respecting paroles you will give me early information, and I request that you will make particular inquiry as to the conduct of the officers and crew of the Decatur on the charge brought against them, from such sources as can be depended on, and give me the most authentic information you can obtain, as also a list of the crew when she returned into port, also descriptive of the persons composing it, which may be readily had of the collector.

OCTOBER 16, 1813.

I hasten to reply, partially, to your letter of the 5th instant, which has this moment come to hand, accompanied by extracts, &c., therein referred to. Respecting paroles, they have never been, in any instance, denied to characters who were deemed worthy of them. I confess, in consequence of several breaches of paroles by captains of merchantmen, I felt, on the arrival of the Decatur, some hesitation in granting Captain Sinclair, master of a merchantman, a parole; but, as soon as I could receive the pledge of the British sub-agent here for his good conduct, I granted his parole. I have since paroled Captain Sinclair to Liverpool on the conditions prescribed by the cartel. The midshipmen taken in the Dominica were paroled as soon as possible after their arrival here. Those officers who came under the character of non-combatants were immediately released. Without orders from your Department, I shall not, on any occasion, parole officers below the grade of captains of merchantmen, and shall be very circumspect towards them. Therefore, sir, all that extract of Colonel Barclay's letter to you, which speaks of the refusal of paroles, is not founded on fact.

OCTOBER 26, 1813.

A letter from Dr. Tidyman, a gentleman of respectable professional standing, who volunteered his services to the wounded on their arrival here, is enclosed.

I have not been able to procure any certain information as to the characters of the persons who composed the crew of the Decatur; as near as I can come to the fact, she had about three-fourths white men on board.

Those officers who were heard to speak of the treatment which they received from the privatesmen, after their surrender, having gone from this place, I have been obliged to resort to the certificate of such gentlemen as questioned them on this point; which certificate I have forwarded to you.

CHARLESTON, October 8, 1813.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request, I hasten with cheerfulness to state to you my opinion of your conduct towards the British prisoners of war captured in the Dominica by the Decatur; and it is with peculiar pleasure I can candidly say that, during the short time I attended the wounded, in company with Dr. Waring, I heard the prisoners express the most perfect satisfaction and gratitude at the humane treatment they received from yourself, and also from Captain Pratt, acting under your instructions; and I must confess that, in every part of Europe which I have visited, I never saw better treatment shown towards prisoners of war than is now experienced by the British prisoners on board of the prison-ship under the immediate command of Captain Pratt. To the best of my knowledge their diet is not only wholesome, but very liberal. I have no hesitation further to state that the officers of the Dominica, with Captain Sinclair of the British merchant ship London Trader, did receive their paroles within a very few days after the arrival of the respective vessels in our harbor.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

Your conduct has been, to the best of my observation, such as to entitle you to the good opinion of your fellow-citizens. You have acted in the strict line of your duty, and, consequently, must merit the approbation of your Government. I am extremely sorry to find that you have been unjustly charged with denying paroles to British officers, and keeping them in confinement on board of the prison-ship. The character of an informer is always obnoxious; but when he descends to falsehoods, he then indeed ought to be treated as an outcast of society. With respect to your inquiry relative to what I know of the treatment which the British prisoners sustained on board of the Dominica and Decatur, I must beg leave to inform you that, as my only object in seeing those unfortunate men was to discharge the duties of my profession towards them, I considered it, therefore, indelicate to submit questions which might unnecessarily give rise to any unpleasant feelings or conversation on a subject that was foreign to my purpose, and which I felt myself unauthorized to seek into. When they were delivered to Captain Pratt they all appeared to be well clothed, and many brought with them their baggage. With respect to myself, I have done no more than was consistent with the duty of a Christian, and it is one I shall always feel gratified in discharging towards prisoners of any nation.

With sentiments of respect, &c.

PHILIP TIDYMAN.

MORTON A. WARING, Esq.

Marshal, Charleston.

CHARLESTON, October 26, 1813.

We hereby certify that, on the day subsequent to the arrival of the American private armed schooner Decatur, Captain Dominique d'Iron, with her prize, the British armed schooner Dominica, into this port, we, the undersigned, went on board the latter vessel, in company with several gentlemen, among others the honorable John Drayton, Judge of the Admiralty; and during our stay on board the said vessel we conversed with some of the prisoners, by whom we were explicitly informed that they had been treated by the captors "like brothers." It was remarked by them that there was considerable carnage and bloodshed, naturally consequent to the confusion of boarding, but after possession of the prize had been taken by the captors, every kindness was afforded.

JAMES JEWEL,
JOHN PRATT,
J. B. WHITE.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
Washington, August 27, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit you copies of the following letters from Dr. Samuel McKeehan, surgeon's mate, second regiment of the Ohio militia; to Major General Dearborn, of the 24th of May last; two from the same person, one of the 6th of May and one of the 9th of May, to Lieutenant Dudley; and one of the 12th of May, from George H. Rodgers, of the United States' Army, to Lieutenant Dudley.

You will perceive from the statement of Dr. McKeehan, if it is correct, and, from the respectability of his character, there is too much reason to believe it, that outrages have been committed on his person, not to be justified. I do not, however, in requiring an explanation, rest this matter on the statement of the suffering person only: Lieutenant Dudley, of the United States' Navy, was at Montreal during his confinement, as you will remark by the letters addressed to him. That gentleman furnished me himself with the originals of the two letters addressed to him by Dr. McKeehan, and of that from George H. Rodgers, and confirmed all that is stated by the Doctor to have happened, after his (the Lieutenant's) arrival at Montreal, and assured me that the Doctor's treatment, previous to that time, was spoken of in Canada as a matter of notoriety, to be such as he has represented it.

I request, sir, that you will be pleased to inquire into the facts, and the causes alleged for treatment so inhuman to a man sent by the proper authority, under the sacred protection of a flag of truce, to administer kindly offices and medical aid to our wounded prisoners, and also into the facts of the severe confinement and cruel usage alleged to have been used towards the fourteen American prisoners at Montreal, named by Dr. McKeehan.

I shall refrain, sir, from pointing out what may be thought the proper atonement to be made on the cases described, until your explanation is received. I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MASON.

Col. THOS. BARCLAY, &c.

MONTREAL PRISON, May 6, 1813.

SIR: I am an unfortunate American who was taken by the Indians on my way to Malden, with a flag of truce from General Harrison, on the night of the 31st of January, and after a variety of indignities, too tedious to mention, I was brought here and put into the dungeon for thirty-three days, and have been up on the centre floor a week. I wish to see you, if possible, and have your advice, &c. In haste, yours, &c.

SAMUEL MCKEEHAN.

Surgeon's Mate, Ohio Militia.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

MONTREAL PRISON, May 9, 1813.

SIR: Yesterday Sir George's aid came and informed me that the nature of my confinement had been contrary to his orders, and Colonel Lethbridge was required to restore my liberty. I was also informed that you and myself would probably, in a few days, be sent to the United States. Colonel Lethbridge told me he would send for me at three o'clock and take my parole. In less than an hour Major Shackleton called, and said the Governor, after more mature consideration, had concluded he could not let me have my liberty until he would hear from General Proctor.

Two or three days after my imprisonment, Major Shackleton told me that General Proctor had promised, with the next despatches, to send on all the papers relating to my case, and that then I would have a hearing.

So you may see punishment by torture is not yet abolished. If they had drove a dagger through my heart my punishment would have been much less, and their compassion much greater.

Yours, &c.

SAMUEL MCKEEHAN.

Major Shackleton also told me that Colonel Baynes was unauthorized to tell me what he did.
S. McK.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

MONTREAL JAIL, May 12, 1813.

SIR: I am requested by Dr. McKeehan to inform you of his present unpleasant situation. He is at this time so unwell as to be confined to his bed, and has no chance of getting anything to make him comfortable. No person attends here to examine our situation, neither have we a chance to send out after any necessaries that we want.

I am confident the Doctor's case requires some very speedy aid, particularly as it respects his confined situation, lodging, &c.

Yours, respectfully,

GEORGE H. RODGERS,

United States' Army.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

NIAGARA COFFEE HOUSE,

May 24, 1813.

SIR: Without introduction or apology, I beg leave to state to your Excellency that, on the 31st of January last, I was ordered by General Harrison to proceed to the river Raisin with a flag of truce. I was required in my instructions, if I met no British officer at that place, to proceed to Malden, if too great danger did not appear from the savages. The same evening, thirty-three miles from the river Raisin, the Indians fired upon us and killed Mr. Lamont, one of my attendants, wounded myself in the foot, then conveyed me to Captain Elliott, who took me to the river Raisin, and from thence sent me to General Proctor at headquarters in Sandwich, who swore, by God, that the flag and papers which I gave him were only a pretence to cover a dishonorable service. I rebutted his insinuations as moderately as my indignant feelings would permit. General Proctor made several observations on General Harrison's ability as a commander; said he was used to fight Indians, but not British troops, &c. He kept my instructions; did not even inform the senior officer, Ensign Baker, of the American prisoners, that he had a letter for him. I was ordered to a tavern, under the care of a French sergeant. I waited until the 4th of February before I wrote to General Proctor, demanding in what character I was considered, how long I would be detained, and the cause of my detention.

The next day the General's Aid informed me I was recognised as surgeon's mate, and would attend with Dr. Brown on the American wounded prisoners. On the 12th I received a letter from General Proctor, in answer to one I had written to him on the day before, of which the following is a copy:

SANDWICH, February 12, 1813.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 11th instant, I am directed by Colonel Proctor, commanding, to observe that you were sent in for the purpose of attending on the sick and wounded of General Winchester's army, for which purpose you are now detained, and beg leave further to observe that, in the execution of your duty, you will render a most important service to your country. I have the honor to be, &c.

A. W. McLEAN, A. D. C.

I continued to attend the wounded until the 2d of March, when A. D. C. McLean informed me that I was accused of carrying on a private correspondence, and that he was ordered to take me into custody, and secure my papers, which was accordingly done in the most uncivil manner. On the 7th of March I was taken by a guard to Fort George, without trial or hearing, although I had written to General Proctor repeatedly, requesting an investigation, to which I received no answer of any kind. From Fort George I was sent to Montreal, and hurried on, night and day, although thinly clothed, having been robbed and stripped by the Indians, and the weather very cold. On my arrival at Montreal, I was, without being asked any questions, or permitted to ask any myself, put into a dungeon eight or ten feet below the surface of the ground, in dark and solitary confinement, and there kept thirty-three days, after which I was put up with the American prisoners. A few days after my elevation, Lieutenant Dudley became acquainted with my situation, and made such representations to Governor Prevost as induced his Excellency to send his Aid, Colonel Baynes, who said he was directed by the Governor to inform me that the outrage which had been committed on my person was contrary to his orders, and told Colonel Lethbridge to take my parole and liberate me immediately. The Colonel, not having materials for writing at hand, said he would send for me at three o'clock. In less than an hour the Town Major came, and informed me that the Governor, on more mature consideration, thought he could not liberate me until he got despatches from General Proctor. On the 17th of May, eight or ten days after, I was taken from prison, and, in company with Lieutenant Dudley, sent to the United States. I may here observe that the apartment in which I was confined did not contain either chair, bench, or stool, or bedding, whatever, for the space of two weeks. Fresh beef was furnished, but no salt. I was denied pen, ink, and paper, and treated uniformly with the utmost contempt by the sergeant, whom I had the honor of seeing once every day for a few minutes. By the request of fourteen American prisoners, now in Montreal jail, whose names are hereunto annexed, I beg leave to state to your Excellency that they are kept in close confinement, sometimes half a day without water, and frequently two or three days without wood to cook with; and when they complained, the jailer's curses were freely lavished upon them. They have not the privilege of procuring some little necessities, which the benevolence of some humane persons enabled them to do, by giving them a little money. Sir George Prevost has told them that their confinement is owing to the bad faith of their own Government, &c.

I would have stated to your Excellency the knowledge I had, through a report of others, of the outrages and cruelties exercised on the American prisoners taken at General Winchester's defeat, but must refer your Excellency to Mr. Rutland, who had a command in the Michigan militia last Summer, and who was, after having been dispossessed of all his property, sent to Fort George with me; who, no doubt, had many opportunities of hearing such things triumphantly spoken of among British officers and subjects.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

SAMUEL McKEEHAN,

Surgeon's Mate 2d reg't Ohio militia.

Major Gen. DEARBORN.

Colonel Thomas Barclay to General Mason.

HARLEM, August 30, 1813.

SIR: In reply to my letter of the 27th current, respecting Mr. Samuel McKeehan, Surgeon's Mate in the Ohio militia, and fourteen American prisoners at Montreal, mentioned by him, I beg leave to assure you that no exertions on my part shall be omitted to obtain an early and satisfactory elucidation of the treatment stated to have been received by Mr. McKeehan, and which he represents the fourteen other prisoners at Montreal experienced. By the next post I shall take the liberty to transmit to you a despatch to his Excellency Sir George Prevost on the subject, with copies of your letter, and the documents enclosed therewith, which I request you will be pleased to have forwarded to Canada by a flag of truce.

I confidently hope a satisfactory explanation will be returned: whatever else may be considered as exceptionable traits in the characters of the individuals composing the nation to which I belong, inhumanity towards prisoners has, I suspect, never before been attributed.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS BARCLAY.

General MASON.

General Mason to Colonel Thomas Barclay.

HARLEM, August 17, 1813.

SIR: The enclosed is a copy of a letter to Mr. Moore, sub-agent for British prisoners at Schenectady, from Joseph Edwards and Doctor I. Muirhead, two of His Majesty's justices of the peace for the district of Niagara, who, it appears, were paroled on or before the 14th of June last, by the American General commanding at Fort George, but have since been made prisoners, and marched to Albany, without having (as they state) committed any offence, and no cause assigned for this treatment.

If their statement is correct, which, from the respectability of their characters, is most probable, the treatment they have received is a gross violation of the cartel of the 12th of May.

I request you will be pleased to take immediate measures to ascertain the facts, and if the merits turn out, as I hope they will, in favor of these gentlemen, that you will order them to be released, reimburse their expenses from Niagara to Albany, pay three shillings sterling per day for subsistence while in Albany, (to which their rank entitles them,) the necessary allowance for their expenses back to Niagara, and furnish them with passports to return thither.

But should the result of your inquiries prove that these gentlemen have acted improperly or imprudently, I request you will possess me with the particulars. I have the honor to be, &c.

OFFICE COMM'Y GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, August 23, 1813.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 17th instant, and have written this day to the deputy marshal at Pittsfield, to make the necessary inquiries there, and at Albany, as to the case of Joseph Edwards and I. Muirhead, whose own account of their treatment you have transmitted. I can only assure you, sir, that if anything incorrect has been done towards these persons, an immediate and proper course shall be taken; at any rate, you shall be informed of the result of my inquiries.

In the meantime I shall refrain from entering into a discussion of the merits of the case as supposed by you. I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Colonel Robert Gardner, United States' agent for prisoners near Quebec.

OCTOBER 23, 1813.

Information has been received at this office, that Doctor William McDowell Scott, late Marshal of the United States at Detroit, seized by the British officer commanding at that place, during last Summer, and sent to Quebec, was, and is still, closely confined there; and that Doctor

Great Britain—Naturalization.

James W. Wood, of Plattsburg, Champlain, and Innis B. Palmer, of Schlosser, respectable private citizens, have been seized by the same authority, and confined at the same place.

You are requested to inquire of the proper authority into the circumstances of these cases, and if you find them to exist in the manner I suppose them to be, to remonstrate, respectfully, but strongly, against the confinement and detention of these gentlemen, and that you will use your efforts to have them liberated and sent back to their country, with the prisoners about to be released. You will be pleased to report, in any event, particularly to me, the circumstances of each case, the manner of confinement and treatment, and the alleged cause.

General Mason to Thomas Barclay.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, December 27, 1813.

SIR: Under cover with this, I have the honor to transmit you copies of letters and enclosures received from Colonel Gardner, American agent for prisoners of war in Canada, received a few days ago by Colonel Boerstler, a list of which is annexed.

By these you will perceive the manner in which that gentleman is restricted; how different the treatment towards him from that observed towards the British agents similarly situated in this country. In short, that he is so tied up, that it is impossible that his functions can be performed in such a way as to be of the utility intended toward our prisoners, by the letter and spirit of the arrangement on this subject between the two nations.

I beg to call your particular attention to the letters which passed between Colonel Gardner and Captain Kemp, your agent for prisoners relative to rations. You will observe, sir, that as late as the 31st of October, my last communication, the allowance stipulated by the cartel had not been furnished our prisoners. I have to request, sir, that you will make immediate interference on this occasion, and cause a full allowance to be made them. Our soldiers will feel keenly the difference between half a pound of bread and half a pound of meat. Yours have constantly had it since the establishment of the cartel, and, before that, even more; an early inquiry on this subject is the more necessary on your part, because, from the hesitation of your officers, it does not appear that they mean to alter the system on the remonstrance of Colonel Gardner; and because, as your commanders had refused to receive an agent in Canada, until the latter part of last Summer, we had no means of ascertaining what was the subsistence allowed by your officers in that quarter to our prisoners, until the arrival of Colonel Gardner; remonstrance from this office has been much later than it otherwise would have been.

You will remark, sir, by the communication of General Glasgow, of the 15th of October, to Colonel Gardner, that his letters are all inspected before they are permitted to come away, and by Colonel Gardner's letter to me of the 19th of October, that all letters, even from this office to him, will be opened.

I am instructed, sir, to request you, in future, to send all your letters for Canada unsealed through this office, and to inform you that all letters from that quarter to you must be inspected.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Thomas Gardner, United States' agent for prisoners in Canada, to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

BEAUFORT, October 15, 1813.

I have this day visited the prison at Quebec, accompanied by Colonel Perry, who has a particular command in the city, which includes the prison. Thirteen persons were shown me who were said to be Americans; on inquiry I find, that Doctor Scott and a Mr. Knaggs are American citizens; copies of the statements of their several cases I have the honor to enclose, having also enclosed in a letter to Sir George Prevost (copy of which is herewith) duplicates of the above statements. A Mr. John Gilbert and a black man of the name of Jones are also American citizens; they had previously given to Colonel Perry a statement of their cases, and he forwarded them to Sir George Prevost; they promise to give me copies, and, when I have them, I shall do what I can in their behalf; they were residents in Canada before the war, the others have been long residents in Canada, and most of them under the oath of allegiance to the British Government; one of them (a Roswell Johnson) went from Chary, within the British lines, to shun a militia draught. The situation of these men are as comfortable as prisoners in jail can expect to be; and they say that since Colonel Perry has had the command of the place it is much bettered. There is also on board one of the prison-ships an American citizen of the name of Stephen Richards, whom I think detained contrary to the spirit of the cartel. I have sent a copy of his statement to Sir George Prevost; I enclose you another.

[Enclosed in the preceding letter.]

Mr. William H. Scott to Colonel Gardner.

QUEBEC PRISON, October 8, 1813.

SIR: I beg leave to make a candid statement of my situation. I came into the United States early in 1796, a young man. I resided several years there, and at length regularly became a citizen, and held some respectable appointments. In this situation I was surrendered by General Hull to General Brock, in August, 1812, when we were to be protected in persons and property, and the militia of the country to remain peaceably at home as if nothing had occurred. Shortly after this, I was stripped of all my personal property to upwards of five hundred dollars. I remained quietly at home, and in the Fall had permission from General Proctor to depart in a vessel, but the season was late and the vessel leaky, so that we had to return. In this manner I remained until the month of February last, when, with a number of Americans, I was ordered to quit the territory for the State of New York, by the way of Fort George, and furnished with a regular passport as a citizen to behave as becometh. We travelled this distance at our own expense, and without any guard. While remaining at Fort George I was examined before his Excellency Sir George Prevost, who declared that I was to be considered in no other light than the others of Brush's militia who were all crossed over there. It was not deemed expedient to cross over any more at that place. Colonel Brush had permission to return to his family, or to go to Kingston, and he crossed over there, which he did two or three days afterwards. While waiting for liberty to cross over I was warned to hold myself in readiness to proceed to Kingston; I was taken charge of as a prisoner by the sergeants and conducted to Kingston from one jail, guard-house, or cell, to another, and from thence to Montreal, where I was examined by the police and committed as a prisoner of war; received information I should be crossed over the line from the police office in the course of a week, and just at that time I was forwarded to this city, and I am now confined as a British subject having an intention of joining Harrison's army, although I had never been examined. Since, and all Winter, if I had been so disposed, could have rode to the army in three hours' time, as it was not thirty miles distant from my farm. I have applied to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to investigate the case, but without success as yet. If I am a British subject, I have done nothing to merit imprisonment; if an American citizen, I am illegally confined and detained in prison in this manner. The contractor's agent at Malden purchased cattle of mine for which I have not been paid, exclusive of others taken for immediate consumption, and to be paid for. Also, for the use of my horses for expresses and fatigue; and in addition my horses and sleigh, which I had to leave about twenty miles back of Fort George, when I was made a prisoner. All these things I have suffered without any act or deed, on my part, that I know of, to merit this punishment; and, to crown all, thrown into the common prison, among felons, convicts, and negroes, and sometimes deprived of the common field rations, far from my family and friends, or the means of assistance and relief.

I hope my case, sir, being taken into consideration, I may be honorably released, and suffered to depart in search of my afflicted wife and distressed family. I have the honor to remain, &c.

WILLIAM H. SCOTT.

To Colonel GARDNER.

Mr. Stephen Richards to Colonel Gardner.

ON BOARD H. M. SHIP LORD CATHCART,
QUEBEC, October 14, 1813.

HONORED SIR: I resided in Upper Canada at the commencement of the present war, and, refusing to take up arms against my country, I left this country under the proclamation of General Sheaf, in Upper Canada, turning myself and family out of doors and home to seek another in the United States.
13th CON. 2d SESS.—70

I need not inform you of my feelings on this turn of fortune, which always attend the ravages of war. But my greatest care was for my family, which I considered myself the author of tearing them from their relatives and friends, in removing them to a place they were strangers to. We had lived about six months in this situation, when my wife grew very uneasy to go back to Canada to pay her father's family a visit, which brought an illness on her on this account. I thought it my duty to do what I could for her, and it terminated in making myself a prisoner for six weeks to this day. The way it took place was, that I came to Morristown, opposite to Brockville, where I was taken, and inquired if there was an officer of the army whereby I might procure a flag; but was informed there was none. They informed me that they had crossed with a flag, although not regular, and had always permission to return; and, under this impression, I crossed with my wife; there was a major of the militia who came down to receive me, and told me he had no orders to let me land; I told him I would return; but some of my wife's friends desired the major to let her stay until her brother (who lived near by) could come down and see her; he then told me that I might come alongside the wharf; from thence he informed me that I could go up as far as a tavern, where I was immediately put under guard as a prisoner, and have been sent on as a prisoner of war as far as this place. Thus, honored sir, if you think my situation is worthy of your notice to procure me a discharge, your goodness shall never be eradicated from my memory.

Yours, most respectfully,

STEPHEN RICHARDS,

Citizen of the United States.

Colonel GARDNER, Agent.

Doctor Wood to Colonel Gardner.

BEAUFORT, Oct. 18, 1813.

SIR: I take the liberty of troubling you for a moment, and have only to state that I am detained a prisoner in Beaufort by the British Government, and solicit your assistance in procuring my release.

I am a resident of the town of Champlain, in the State of New York, and have resided within one and a half miles of the line of separation between the two Governments for a number of years. I was taken a prisoner by the British troops on their expedition to Plattsburg, on the 30th July last, and have been detained ever since; of which, sir, I think I have just cause to complain, as I was promised by Colonel Murray, who commanded the troops, and Captain Everard, who commanded the navy, that I should not be detained any longer than until their return from Plattsburg, of which I can produce satisfactory testimony; and further, that those officers pledged themselves and their Government by their proclamation, the purport of which was, that if the American citizens would not oppose them with force and arms on their Plattsburg expedition, they, nor their property, should not be molested; which condition was strictly adhered to by the American people.

His Excellency, the Governor of the Provinces, Sir George Prevost, issued a proclamation the 4th of September last, disavowing the principle and act of imprisoning civilians, and he cannot pretend that I was taken in retaliation for civilians taken in Canada; for in his proclamation, dated more than one month after I was taken, he disavows of ever having retaliated, but speaks in the future tense, that he will retaliate hereafter in case the Americans persist in the same unlawful practice of seizing and detaining civilians belonging to the British Government.

I am the only prisoner, taken on or near our frontier, who was not doing military duty, and I believe that if Sir George Prevost is possessed of humanity, I am sure he cannot help sympathizing with the unfortunate; and he must be aware of the immense sacrifices of being separated from a family in the way I have been; and, sir, if you will procure my discharge you will lay me under the greatest obligations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES WOOD.

Colonel GARDNER, &c.

Robert Gardner, Esq., Agent for Prisoners, to His Excellency Sir George Prevost.

BEAUFORT, October, 1813.

SIR: There are detained in Quebec jail two persons by the names of William H. Scott and Whitmore Knaggs; one on board the transport Lord Cathcart, by the name of Stephen Richards, and one other at Beaufort by the name of James Wood, who complain that they are improperly held and detained, the three former as prisoners of war, the latter as a hostage for a Mr. Dixon, taken at Fort George. Copies of the statements of their several cases, made by themselves, I have the honor to forward to your Excellency.

Mr. Scott appears, by his statement, to have been once examined by you, and that according to what he conceived to be your opinion then concerning him, he was not a prisoner of war, and ought to have been returned. What new matter has been brought to light against him, and which is legal grounds for confining him now as a prisoner of war, I cannot tell.

Mr. Knaggs, if his statements are correct, is, as I conceive, improperly detained upon a slight suspicion excited against him without much cause, and which, he says, he can prove to be groundless.

Richards is a simple man, and has been brought into difficulty by following the advice of men who knew as little as himself. He, no doubt, came improperly within the lines, but merely accidentally did so, with his wife in company, and there is no pretence that he was a soldier, or in arms, as he informs me, and if so, he is certainly, according to the cartel, a non-combatant, a private citizen, not liable to be held a prisoner of war.

With respect to Dr. Wood, his case is fully stated by himself. It seems he is not exactly a prisoner of war, but held as a hostage. If, as he states, he was improperly seized in the first instance, I beg leave to ask of your Excellency whether his subsequent detention as a hostage is not also improper? He had no agency in the seizure of Mr. Dixon, whether such seizure was correct or not, but relying, as he says, upon the assurances given him by the commanders of the British land and naval forces on the expedition to Plattsburg, looked upon the return of that expedition to the coast of Champlain as the period of his enlargement and restoration to his family. I forbear to make any further remarks on the statements of the above persons, or on their particular cases, in the full confidence that they will receive your Excellency's consideration, and that it will be your pleasure to restore them to their families, if consistent with the discharge of your duty, or that you will have the goodness to give me information, for the satisfaction of my Government, wherein their statements are incorrect.

I have the honor, &c.

ROBERT GARDNER,

American Agent for Prisoners of War.

His Exc'y Sir GEORGE PREVOST, &c.

The brothers of Doctor Wood to General Mason.

PLATTSBURG, Dec. 6, 1813.

SIR: Being brothers of Doctor James W. Wood, the undersigners, with Major E. D. Wood, of the Engineers, beg leave to solicit your attention to a subject very interesting to us, and of the greatest importance to the unfortunate sufferer; more peculiarly so, as he is a private citizen, in no manner connected with the army or navy, without public support, and unexpectedly hurried, by a relentless enemy, from his country and numerous family, daily exposed, from their proximity to the frontiers of the country, to the cruelty and depredations of the foe.

The characteristic humanity, and the watchfulness of the national authorities for the safety and protection of American citizens, have inspired us with a (well founded, we trust,) confidence that the proper official means will be taken to answer our humble request in restoring to his country one who was rendered obnoxious to the invading foe by his zeal and activity alone in his country's cause.

Doctor James W. Wood was taken by a British invading force, near the northern limits of the State of New York, on Lake Champlain, the 30th of July last, soon after conducted to Beaufort, near Quebec, and is now confined there as a hostage for the restoration of Mr. Dixon, a lawyer, taken some time since by the United States' troops under General Dearborn, at or near Fort George, and is now confined a prisoner at Pittsfield.

The public interest permitting, we earnestly entreat that a speedy exchange may take place between them, or some other method, in your wisdom, be resorted to, by which our unfortunate brother may be released from the pain and horror of British imprisonment, and shall continue to solicit.

We are, sir, your very obedient servants,
BENJAMIN G. WOOD,
JONATHAN K. WOOD,
IRA A. WOOD,
BEZABEL WOOD, JUN.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS.
 WASHINGTON, Nov. 30, 1813.

SIR: I am instructed to direct you to release all the persons, in civil capacity, now in your charge and on parole, who had been arrested in Canada, in the neighborhood of Fort George, last Summer, of whom you may have no information of misconduct, to return to their homes in Canada, by the most direct route, avoiding all military works and posts. You will give to each a special passport, descriptive of his name and person, and directing him to present himself immediately on his arrival in Canada to the American commander at Fort George, who will be requested to permit them to pursue their usual avocations, and remain at their respective places of residence, during their correct and peaceable demeanor.

They are, I understand, to be William Dickson, barrister at law; Joseph Edwards, merchant and justice of peace; James Muirhead, surgeon; Andrew Heron, merchant, Niagara; John Greer, ditto; John Baldwin, ditto; John Crooks, clerk to James Crooks, merchant; Haggai Skinner, farmer, full sixty-four years of age; — Doan, farmer; — Ramsay, a boy of Stamford; John McFarlane, boat builder.

William Ross, of the commissariat; Alexander Donald, deputy paymaster of militia; and John Symington, deputy paymaster of militia, if they do not hold militia commissions in the line.

You will state to these gentlemen, some of whom are known to be very respectable, that the Government has granted this indulgence from a desire to alleviate the sufferings of individuals as much as the present posture of things will permit, and that it is expected of them that they will, on their return, so demean themselves as to give no future cause of complaint.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Colonel Thomas Barclay, dated

On the 30th ultimo, orders were given to release, to return to their homes, the British subjects, Messrs. Dickson, Muirhead, and others, sent in from the vicinity of Fort George in civil capacity, relative to whom you inquired in the month of August, and I learn from Major Melville that they have set out on their return.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Baines, Adjutant General of the forces in Canada, to Thomas Melville, Esq., Deputy Marshal of Massachusetts, dated at MONTREAL, January 31, 1814.

By this opportunity, Doctors Campbell and Easterman are sent back, in conformity to the terms of the cartel, as being non-combatants, and in consequence of your assurance of the release of William Dickson, and the other civilians of Niagara, Messrs. Wood, Scott, Deputy Assistant Commissary Heron, and all other non-combatants, under similar circumstances, have been released and permitted to return at their own convenience, and on the same terms. I have to solicit the release of Deputy Assistant Commissary Green.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
 WASHINGTON, January 19, 1814.

SIR: I have now to speak of the facts alleged, and the inferences drawn, in the publication made by you on the 13th of last month, respecting which act I had occasion, in a despatch of this date, to convey to you the sentiments of this Government.

The effort on your part seems to have been to invalidate, before the people of the United States, the whole of the statement relative to the treatment of our agent and prisoners, made, on oath, by Mr. Abraham Walter, late a prisoner at Quebec, by disproving what he had deposed respecting the provisions served out to our prisoners. His allegations, however, that several American prisoners, taken with him in June last, were immediately separated from their comrades and confined, to be sent to England to be tried for treason, on the mere suspicion of the examining officer; that others were forced on board British vessels, to assist in working them to Halifax and England; that forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers were imprisoned under a proclamation previously made; that some of the American officers had been rigorously confined on the plea of breach of parole; and that Colonel Gardner, the American agent at Quebec, was restricted to the same limits prescribed to prisoners of war on parole, and not permitted to visit prisoners in the prison-ships, or the town, to negotiate his bills, are most of them unquestionably true; and that others, from practices known on different occasions, are by no means improbable, can be readily shown. Of the first class are the facts of the confinement of the forty-six officers, about which no evidence is now necessary; of the treatment of Colonel Gardner, witness the letter of General Glasgow to him of the 19th of October, a copy of which has been heretofore furnished you; of the rigorous confinement of some of the American officers, though it is believed not in irons, for an accidental overstepping of the parole limits, as I am assured by Colonel Boerstler, lately a prisoner at and returned from the vicinity of Quebec,*

* It has been found, on further communication with Colonel Boerstler, that he was in part misapprehended in relation to the American officers confined at Quebec was the case; and of the forcing our seamen, prisoners at Quebec, to work British ships. To prove this fact, I send you an extract of a letter from Mr. Mitchell, our agent at Halifax, dated November 11, 1813, in which he expressly states that "some of our people have been employed to navigate their transports from Quebec here, and on from this for Bermuda, the transport seamen having been sent on the Lakes," and that he had remonstrated against it; and that this practice is not new, I beg leave to recall to your recollection an advertisement by Mr. Maude, in the Jamaica newspaper, (exhibited to you in my last,) in which he, the British agent for prisoners in that island, offers to hire American prisoners to work British ships on their voyages, &c.; this fact has since been inquired into and established. I have in my possession a Jamaica newspaper containing the advertisement.

Of the second class, is the circumstance of confining American prisoners, on the charge of treason, on mere suspicion. For a similar procedure, I refer to the instances quoted in my letter to you of 23d of November, and an extract of a letter from Mr. Mitchell, of the 11th November last, stating that twelve or fourteen persons, so sent, had passed Halifax, from Quebec, for England. With regard to the other points, previous to the establishment of the cartel entered into between you and myself in May last, and immediately after your arrival in this country, complaints had been made from many quarters, from all as to the quantity, and from several as to the quality of the provisions furnished our prisoners. I will instance a few of them. Mr. Beasley, our agent in England, stated, in a letter dated November 5, 1812, that the allowance per man, other than of bread and vegetables, was, for five days of the week, only half a pound of beef a day, and, for the other two days, one pound a day of herrings or codfish. Mr. Mitchell, American agent at Halifax, wrote, on the 17th of October of the same year, that the prisoner ration there, besides bread and vegetables, consisted of no more than half a pound of meat per day. Colonel Lear, our late Consul General to the Barbary States, having been, on his way from Algiers to the United States, detained at Gibraltar, from early in August to the latter part of November, by the seizure of the ship in which he was a passenger, and all other American ships in port, and the confinement of their officers and crews as prisoners of war, acquired a good knowledge of their treatment from the interference in their behalf which his public character authorized him to make, and informed the Government that "the allowance for American seamen, prisoners in Gibraltar, was, according to the technical expression of the place, six upon four—that is, the full allowance of four for breach of parole; that, as to the accidental overstepping the local limits, he alluded to another case, in which certain officers were threatened with confinement; and that the officers referred to by Mr. Walter had actually committed a reprehensible breach of limits, were closely confined for that offence, and so remained at the time of the last accounts from Quebec.

men to be divided among six prisoners; and it was universally said, the part of the allowance which consisted of bread and peas was in so decayed a state as not to be fit or wholesome to be eaten, and that the whole was deficient in weight, according to the proportion before stated. But upon this subject, as well as upon all other points relative to the treatment of American seamen, prisoners in Gibraltar, while I was there, I would refer you to Captain Eben. Eveleth, late master of the Alleghany.* The following is an extract from a letter of Captain Eveleth to me, on the same subject:

"With respect to the crew of the Alleghany, they were sent on board the prison-ship the day after she was detained, and there closely confined till the last of January, when they were sent to England.

"During their confinement on board the prison-ship, their allowance was as follows, viz., for six men :

Days of the week.	Bread.	Beef, pieces of 8 lbs.	Pork, pieces of 4 lbs.	Pints of peas.	Pints of oatmeal.	Ounces of sugar.	Pints of cocoa.	Pints of rice.	Pounds of raisins.
Sunday - - - -	4	1	2
Monday - - - -	4	-	-	4	6	4
Tuesday - - - -	4	1*
Wednesday - - -	4	-	2	-	-	-	4	3
Thursday - - - -	4	-	1	2
Friday - - - -	4	-	2	4	8	4
Saturday - - - -	4	1*

"No fresh provisions or vegetables are allowed on board the prison-ship. The bread, flour, and rice, was generally very bad, being half devoured, and full of insects.

"I myself was permitted to remain on board the Alleghany, with my son, the second mate, and steward, until the 18th of November, when, without the ship being libeled, we were sent on board the prison-ship, and fared in the same manner with the rest of the crew until the 21st of January."

You will no doubt recollect that, when the article of the cartel in relation to rations was under discussion, I more than once took occasion to mention to you that the quantum of the ration, as limited everywhere by your Government, was unsatisfactory; and that we had repeated information of abuses as to the quality of the provisions given out by your officers to our prisoners, while your prisoners had constantly received in the United States the most ample and wholesome allowances. It is true, remonstrances were not then more formally made for what was past, because it was considered a greater object to provide by express agreement against future deficiencies of this nature.

Since the adoption of the cartel, it gives me pleasure to acknowledge that complaints as to the prisoners' rations have been received but from one of the stations at which we have agents, although many have been urged as to other treatment of our prisoners from several. Your Government is in the habit of holding prisoners at many and at distant places, in which, having no agents, we have no certain information of their treatment; but it is remarkable, that in that instance the complaint was made as soon as it was well possible it could have been done, (in four days after the arrival of the agent,) direct to the proper British officer, and remained, as far as we know, as yet unredressed; and that it comes from the very station (Quebec) in relation to which you have thought proper, in your publication, to advance the position, that, if injustice was done, "blame in some degree attaches to the British officer who has care of the prisoners, but the greater proportion of it must rest on Colonel Gardner, whose duty it is to see that justice is done the prisoners." It is to be remarked, too, that you were in possession of the correspondence of Colonel Gardner, on this subject, with your officers, on the 2d of January, when you express yourself as gratified that Colonel Gardner, with two exceptions, confirms the truth of your assertions; now, certainly he speaks of the treatment of prisoners (in the letter complaining of their subsistence) only in regard to provisions; and in others he complains of the imprisonment of the officers, and his being barred all access to them; of the severe privations inflicted on our prisoner soldiers shipped off to England; because of the refusal to permit him to distribute clothing, and a small advance of pay to them; and against your assertion, that he had the best opportunity of knowing in what manner the prisoners under his care have been treated, he expressly states, that he is so restricted that his presence there can be longer of very little use. I need not remind you that, until the latter part of last Summer, your officers in Canada had constantly refused to receive an agent for prisoners from us in that country; that, very soon after their assent to this measure was signified, Colonel Gardner was appointed and despatched; that he left Boston, the place of his residence, on the 1st of September, and, owing to a detention after he entered your lines, did not reach Quebec until the 8th of October; hence the lateness of his complaint, and of my remonstrance to you of the 27th of last month, made very soon after the reception of his letter. Nor is it less singular that the two exceptions, of which you speak so lightly, happen to be in relation to the two principal points on which you have put yourself at issue with Mr. Walter—the quantity and quality of the bread and meat part of the ration served to the prisoners. Colonel Gardner unquestionably, as to both, expresses himself as dissatisfied, and demands redress—as to the meat, in so great a proportion as one-half of the quantity; and as to the quality of the bread, it not being made of wheaten flour. It will be readily granted that he does not represent the quality of either bread or meat to have been, at the time he inspected them, (for we have no accounts, as yet, of but one inspection by him,) such as it is stated to have been by Mr. Walter; but, in justice to Mr. Walter, it must be recollected that he was confined in Quebec, and fed on prisoner's allowance for several months before the arrival of Colonel Gardner; and it is not improbable that, under the direction of officers who had continued from early in Summer, (when we know they received the cartel,) as late as November, to furnish only half the allowance of meat promised by their Government, it may have happened that, at some time during this period, they were as regardless of the quality of the provisions as were the officers in Gibraltar the year before, as shown by letters of Colonel Lear and Captain Eveleth, before quoted. I have the honor to be, &c.

Col. THOS. BARCLAY, &c.

Extracts of a letter from Colonel Thomas Barclay to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated (HARLEM, January 25, 1814.

That Mr. G. Walter's representation did not comport with the truth, is evident from Colonel Gardner's letter of the 12th October, 1813, to Captain Kempt, British agent for transports and prisoners of war, wherein, after stating that the American prisoners at Quebec were not subsisted agreeably to the cartel of the 12th of May, and requesting that half a pound of bread may be deducted from the rations received, and half a pound of beef or a quarter of a pound of pork added, in order to make the ration agree with the directions in the cartel, he adds, "I take this opportunity to say to you, that I see no cause at present to be dissatisfied with the treatment of the prisoners in other respects."

There was no intention or effort on my part, as you have been pleased to state, "to invalidate before the people of the United States the whole of the statement relative to the treatment of your agent and prisoners, made on oath by Mr. Walter;" on the contrary, if a fair construction is given to the publication by me, the other charges, from my silence respecting them, would rather be considered as admitted than denied. I abstained from touching on them, because they have been repeatedly subjects of correspondence between you and me. On the subject of provisions issued to the American prisoners at Quebec you had never complained, and I confess I rather looked for your approbation than objections to my correcting the misrepresentation. The two nations are already sufficiently irritated against each other, to render fuel to the flame unnecessary by means of false representations.

With respect to the grievances stated in your second letter of the 19th instant, I have to remark, that they are matters which must be negotiated between Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, and Admiral Sir John Warren, or with His Majesty's

Great Britain—Naturalization.

Ministers in London. I shall transmit copies of your letter to the Commissioners, and call their attention particularly to Captain Eveleth's table of provisions daily issued at Gibraltar, described in your letters, and acquaint you with the answer.

I have lately received from the Commissioners the objections of His Majesty's Ministers, and the Lords of the Admiralty, to some of the articles of the cartel of 12th of May, 1813, one of which is particularly pointed to the ration of provisions agreed upon in that cartel. I am preparing copies for you, which I hope to forward in a few days.

Lieutenant Deacon to the Secretary of the Navy.

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 10, 1814.

SIR: Enclosed you will receive a list of thirteen American seamen, prisoners of war, confined on board the British prison-ships at Quebec. On or about the middle of September, 1813, they were forcibly taken out of said prison-ships and sent on board the homeward bound transports, to assist in navigating them. A certificate signed by Mr. Osgood, master's mate in the United States' navy, who was present at the time, together with a copy of an order from General Glasgow, the Commandant at Quebec, to Captain Kempt, the British agent for prisoners, directing him to take the American prisoners for that purpose, was left in the hands of General Chandler, to be forwarded on to the Navy Department; as they have not been received, I feel it my duty to make this statement known.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

L. DEACON,

Lieut. com'g U. S. schr. Growler.

Hon. WM. JONES, Sec'y of the Navy.

List of American seamen, prisoners of war, taken from on board the prison-ship at Quebec, to work on board the transports, and sailed from thence.

United States' schooner Growler.—Colvin Williams, boatswain; William H. Warner, seaman; Philip Baker, ditto; William Johnson, do.

Schooner Julia.—William Wilcox, seaman; John Mallet, ditto; John Rian, do.; James Peterson, do.; John Bernard, do.; John Smith, do.; James Riley, do.; Edward Myers, do.; George Springs, do.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
WASHINGTON, April 2, 1814.

SIR: One of the objections to the cartel entered into between you and myself on the 12th of May last, made by the Commissioners of the British Admiralty, as stated to me in your letter of the 1st of February, is to the allowance to prisoners for subsistence. The daily ration agreed upon in that instrument for prisoners, and certainly little enough to support a hearty man without suffering, was one pound of beef, or twelve ounces of pork, one pound of wheaten bread, one-fourth of a pint of peas, or six ounces of rice, or one pound of potatoes, and two quarts of salt and four quarts of vinegar to every one hundred rations. In the new project of arrangement, all stipulation about quantity of provision is rejected; and you inform me that it is intended to give our prisoners one pound and a half of the coarsest bread per day; and to eat with their bread, for two days in the week, no meat; only one pound of herrings, and one pound of potatoes, for one of these days, and, for the other, one pound of codfish and one pound of potatoes; for the other five days only half a pound of fresh beef, half a pound of greens, one ounce of Scotch barley, and one-quarter of an ounce of onions, with one-third of an ounce of salt; no vinegar at any time, and no salt for two days in the week.

I should not have called this subject now separately to your attention, but that in a letter just received from Mr. Storm, agent for American prisoners at Barbadoes, is the following passage: "I now have to state that Mr. Barker, the British agent here, has officially informed me that the convention entered into between yourself and Colonel Barclay has not been ratified by the Government of Great Britain; of course, our prisoners are not allowed more than two-thirds of what they had. I await your instructions on the subject."

I infer from this that the British Government has come to a determination as to the provision article, and have given orders to reduce the ration to the standard stated by you, since it is actually in practice at Barbadoes.

I beg to be informed on this subject. You are pleased to remark, in your letter of the 1st February, in explanation of this article, that the British Government, so frequently involved in war, has had an opportunity to ascertain what is a rational and proper allowance to prisoners; that it is reasonable to suppose the ration used in Britain, as described by you, "is, in truth, a proper allowance."

You must permit me to observe that this was not your opinion heretofore, and I should hope cannot now be so, when you reflect on the subject. It is a matter of daily experience and feeling common to every man of every class in the community. Every man can at once decide that one pound and a half of coarse bread, with the scanty appendages of one pound of herrings or codfish, and one pound of potatoes, will not satisfy for a day the cravings of hunger; and that the half a pound of beef, with the pittance of greens, barley, and onions allowed, will be very little better. Our prisoners in your hands, on such an allowance, must suffer constantly and severely from hunger. Your prisoners, if reduced to a like allowance, must suffer in an equal degree; and yet, repugnant as it will be to the wishes and feelings of this Government, if that course has been determined on by your Government, it will necessarily be adopted here. I request your particular and early attention to this case, so important to humanity, and shall be much gratified if you are authorized to make any arrangement upon the subject that may obviate the sufferings, on both sides, which must ensue by a system which will deal out to the unfortunate prisoners less subsistence than is absolutely requisite.

The privations of these men are, of necessity, sufficiently great; let us avoid increasing them, I entreat you, by refusing that which is everywhere, proverbially, the first call of nature, enough to eat, and the want of which sinks deepest into human wretchedness.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MASON.

Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

BLADENSBURG, April 5, 1814.

SIR: Your letter of the 2d instant I did not receive yesterday noon. My letter to you of 1st of February was drawn up conformably to the instructions I received from the Commissioners. I have long since transmitted to them a copy of my letter to you, and, at the same time, communicated to them fully my sentiments on each of the articles contained in the cartel of the 12th of May, and the amendments proposed. I think it probable I shall receive an answer in May or June. In the interim, however, I hope to receive your answer to my letter; indeed, I have long since expected it. Under present circumstances, I cannot return you an answer to the inquiry contained in your letter of the 2d of this month. The 7th article in the draught of the cartel sent you to be submitted to the President, states, "they (the prisoners) are to be furnished by the Government in whose possession they may be, with a subsistence of sound and wholesome provision." I acknowledge the clause is vague, and perhaps it would have been preferable to have specified the articles and quantity. Yet the word "subsistence," intends a reasonable quantity for the support of nature; and the words "sound and wholesome provision," certainly designate the quality. The precise quantity issued for each Government may readily be ascertained through the respective agents of both nations.

You misapprehend me when I state I inform you that it is intended to give the American prisoners one pound and a half of the coarsest bread a day, &c. By referring to my letter of the 1st of February, you will find I expressed myself in the words following: "I transmit herewith a table of the provisions daily issued to prisoners in Great Britain, and elsewhere in the British dominions, save in such places as the agents have adopted the regulations of the cartel, but which will eventually be countermanded." The quality of the bread is not mentioned; nor did I state that, if the proposed cartel was agreed to by the President, in lieu of that of the 12th of May, that the American prisoners, under the words of the cartel, would receive subsistence precisely conformable to the copy of the table of provisions sent you. I beg leave, however, to say, I think it probable, and for the reasons given in my letter of the 1st of February.

I have received no further information on the subject of the provisions to be issued to prisoners, since I wrote you in February. From what Mr. Storm writes you, it is evident the Commissioners have sent orders to the West Indies on the subject. Lieutenant Miller, at Halifax, in his letter to me of March, does not hint that he had received any.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS BARCLAY.

[Correspondence of Mr. Beasley, concerning seamen impressed from American vessels before the commencement of the war, and detained in the British service.]

Mr. Croker to Mr. Beasley.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, August 5, 1812.

SIR: Having communicated to my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty your letter of the 31st ultimo, transmitting a list of men, said to be Americans, who have been impressed and detained on board His Majesty's ships, and requesting their discharge, I have their Lordships' commands to acquaint you that, under present circumstances, they will defer the consideration of this request. I am, &c.

J. W. CROKER.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Beasley to Mr. Monroe, dated

LONDON, Oct. 23, 1812.

I have informed you that I had addressed Lord Castlereagh on the subject of our citizens who have been impressed, and are now held in the British naval service. I demanded their release, and complained of the treatment which some had received on offering to give themselves up as prisoners, or refusing to serve when they heard of the war. In reply, I have received a short note from Mr. Cooke, one of the under secretaries, stating that he was instructed to require of me the names of the men who had received the treatment complained of, and the vessels in which they were; which I immediately furnished. I urged a reply to the other part of my letter. In an interview which I have since had with Mr. Cooke, I took occasion to remind him of it; when he intimated that the Government did not intend to answer me on that point, adding, that England was fighting the battles of the world; we had chosen to go to war, and so aid the great enemy; and that England had as much right to recruit her army and navy in every possible manner as France.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Beasley to Lord Castlereagh, dated

WIMPOLE STREET, Oct. 12, 1812.

In consequence of the war unhappily existing between the United States and Great Britain, it has become my duty to call your Lordship's attention to the situation of the great number of American seamen who have been impressed, and are now held in the ships of war of His Britannic Majesty.

To put an end to a proceeding and a state of things so revolting to humanity, and so contrary to the law and usage of civilized nations, I persuade myself it is only necessary to present them to the view of the British Government, and I therefore trust that effectual measures will be immediately taken to restore these injured men to liberty and their country.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Beasley to Mr. Cooke, of the Foreign Office, dated

OCTOBER 19, 1812.

I beg you to remind Lord Castlereagh that the other part of my letter of the 12th instant, requesting the release of the American seamen detained in the British service, is still unanswered.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Beasley to Mr. Monroe, dated LONDON, October 28, 1812.

Since writing you the 22d instant, I have called twice at the Foreign Office, and, I am happy to state, I found Mr. Cooke more reasonable on the subject mentioned in my last. Indeed, the tone and substance of his conversation were so much changed, that I shall have little to complain of if followed up in practice. In communicating to you, however, this apparent change, I regret to be obliged to add, that within the last three or four days, many of our seamen have been impressed; and I learn that attempts have been made (and in some instances with success) to entice some who were confined as prisoners to enter into British ships of war and merchantmen.

Mr. Barrow to the Transport Board.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, Feb. 25, 1813.

GENTLEMEN: Having laid before my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty your letter of the 18th instant, enclosing the copy of a letter, together with the documents therein referred to, from Mr. Beasley, the American agent for prisoners of war in this country, on the subject of certain alleged citizens of the United States detained in His Majesty's service, I have it in command to signify their Lordships' directions to you to acquaint Mr. Beasley that neither now, in war, nor before, during peace, is or was the British Government desirous of having American seamen in its service; and that their Lordships will now discharge, as prisoners of war, as they formerly did as neutrals, those persons who can adduce any sufficient proof of their being Americans.

You will further inform Mr. Beasley, that all the cases stated by him have received or are under accurate examination; and that such persons who may appear to be Americans will be immediately sent to prison, as many have been already.

I am, &c.

JOHN BARROW.

WIMPOLE STREET, March 13, 1813.

SIR: I was duly favored with your letters of the 26th ultimo and 6th instant, each enclosing the copy of a letter addressed to the Board on the preceding day by the Secretary of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. I regret that other engagements should have delayed till now a particular notice of their contents, as these include a charge against myself which perhaps required an earlier refutation.

Great Britain—Naturalization.

In the letter of their Lordships' secretary of the 5th instant, the Board are directed to observe to me that the printed letter which I addressed to certain American seamen detained in the British navy, "contains a statement unfounded in fact, for that neither since the war with America, nor before, have their Lordships declined to release American seamen admitted or proved to be such."

It is not necessary to my present purpose to enter upon an examination of their Lordship's conduct on this matter before the war; although my own official observation in numerous cases, when I held the office of Consul, would authorize me to dispute even that part of their secretary's assertion. But with reference to their Lordships' conduct since the war, I beg to remind them of their letter of the 5th August, soon after the commencement of the war, in answer to a request made on the 31st July for the release of certain impressed American seamen, in which their Lordships, going beyond the mere declining to release the men, stated "that, under the present circumstances, they will defer the consideration of the request for their release;" or, in other words, that they will not, at present, war being commenced, even think on the subject of their release. If further proof be necessary of their Lordships having, as I stated in my printed letter, declined the release of such seamen in consequence of the war, I will call to their recollection a letter written by their secretary on the 25th August, in answer to an application for the release of William Wilson, an impressed American detained on board the Cornelia, in which they state that "this man, being an alien enemy, must continue to serve or to go to prison." Should other corroboration be wanted, it may be found in the long and marked silence of the British Government to my numerous applications again and again repeated for the release of these men, seeing that it was not until the 25th February, nearly seven months after their Lordships had informed me of their having deferred the consideration of the subject, and nearly five months after my formal demand made to Lord Castlereagh, that they directed the Board to inform me of their intention to treat them as prisoners of war. And even this was not done until eight days after my printed letter in question appears to have been on their table. Surely it was in utter forgetfulness of all these circumstances that their Lordships declared my statement unfounded in fact; for it appears impossible that they can, in the mind of any person, bear a different interpretation from that which I have given them. But how do these facts bear on their Lordships' statement? How, I ask, does their determination that Wilson, proved and admitted to be an American, must continue to serve or go to prison, support the assertion that their Lordships have not declined to release American seamen admitted or proved to be such? But, perhaps, in their Lordships' view to send them from service and detention in ships of war to confinement in prisons is to release them. If so, it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further, and I will content myself with having vindicated the correctness of the statement.

I come now to the consideration of their Lordships' purpose, as expressed in their secretary's letter of the 25th ultimo, to treat as prisoners of war the American seamen who have been impressed, and are held in the British service. Taking into view the manner in which these unfortunate persons came into the power of the British Government, that their own rights and inclinations, the rights of their country, the law of nations, and every principle of justice, were violated in the very act by which each of these men was brought within its power, and that this wrong accumulates so long as any of them remain in its power, I do maintain that they are, on every ground, entitled to, and that the British Government is bound to grant their immediate and complete release. It acquired them only as the spoils of unlawful violence. How, then, can it retain them as the fruits of lawful war? Its right of control over them can only arise from the lawfulness of their detention; but that which was unlawfully taken cannot be rightfully held; and to acknowledge the pretension to such control as their Lordships' purpose implies, would be to legitimatise the act by which they came into their power. The British Government disclaims all right and all intention to take them, and this disavowal is an acknowledgment of its obligation to restore them to the same condition and to the same freedom from which they were taken. Upon what grounds is it, then, that they are to be treated as prisoners of war? Not many years have elapsed since all Europe resounded with the complaints of Great Britain against France for detaining as prisoners of war certain British subjects, who, having entered the French territories in time of peace, were found there at the breaking out of the war. But if that were regarded in England as an outrage, what will be thought of this detention as prisoners of war of American seamen, who, having been wrongfully taken on the high seas, and forcibly carried into the British service in time of peace, are found therein, at the breaking out of a war doing her service and fighting her battles? The conduct of France was attempted to be justified by certain acts of England, which were alleged to be equally contrary to the law of nations. But what justification, what excuse can be set up for this conduct of Great Britain towards the impressed American seamen? What infraction of the law of nations, what violence or injustice exercised towards British subjects, or what outrage is this cruel act to retaliate? It cannot be the free and spontaneous permission given by the United States, at the commencement of the war, for every British subject of every class and description found within their territories or in their power to return to his country that this imprisonment of American seamen is to requite. And surely this cannot be the indemnification which Great Britain offers these unfortunate men for the wrongs which she has inflicted on them, or the reward which she bestows for the service she has received at their hands.

To the unqualified prohibition of all correspondence between myself and the impressed American seamen in His Britannic Majesty's fleet, so unreservedly stated in the letter of their Lordships' secretary of the 6th instant, I must conform, whatever may be my feelings and sentiments respecting it. The situation in which these unfortunate men and myself stood towards each other, appeared not only to invite but to authorize a communication between us. On their part the object of this correspondence was to obtain information and counsel as to the proper manner of conducting themselves under circumstances the most difficult, and an occasion the most important and solemn, namely: how to act while forcibly held to service in ships of war belonging to a State engaged in actual hostilities against their country; a situation which their own good sense and proper feelings taught them was alike incompatible with their rights and their duties. My part has been, after having waited five months in vain for a communication of their Lordships' intentions, to recommend them, since there appeared no means of obtaining their release, to give themselves up as prisoners of war; an evil comparatively light to that which they suffer. In other instances their letters have related the rejection of their offer and the threats of punishment; and all contain complaints of the unexampled hardship of their situation. However, as their Lordships declare that the British Government has no wish to have American seamen in its service, they will no doubt adopt some effectual plan to make known these sentiments to all such seamen now in its service, and at the same time to inform them of the manner in which, if they desire to leave it, their object may be accomplished. Since I am no longer permitted to advise them in these matters, such a proceeding on the part of their Lordships becomes, under all the circumstances, an indispensable measure of justice towards the men, while it is also necessary to prevent their Lordships' intentions on so momentous a subject from misinterpretation. If the consequence of this interdiction of the correspondence with me be to bring the condition of these men more completely under their Lordships' notice, there will, I trust, be less reason to regret it. I entreat their Lordships to take their claims into the most serious consideration. Their detention appears to be the only remaining ground of that unhappy quarrel which divides the two countries; and in their immediate release their Lordships have an opportunity, by an act of justice and of magnanimity worthy of the British name, to bring back peace, and to restore those relations of honorable friendship so natural and so beneficial to both.

I have the honor, to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

R. G. BEASLEY.

ALEXANDER MCLEAY, Esq., &c.

Transport Office.

Extract of a letter from the Commissioners of the Transport Board, in London, to Reuben G. Beasley, Esq., agent of the United States in England, dated TRANSPORT OFFICE, May 26, 1813.

We have received your letter dated the 15th instant, and, having communicated the same to the Right Honorable the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, we are instructed by their Lordships to inform you that to your former letter of the 13th of March last, their Lordships did not authorize us to return an answer, because it referred to subjects which it is beyond your competency, in the character of agent for prisoners of war, to discuss, and because, easy as it would have been to have completely answered the misconceptions and misstatements of that letter, it seemed unnecessary to proceed with a correspondence which could conduce to no practical effect.

On the subject of your late application, we are to repeat to you, that neither before the war nor since has this country been desirous of retaining in its service any bona fide American citizens, but that the flagrant and undeniable abuses of the official documents of American citizenship (to say nothing of the question of naturalizing British subjects) have obliged their Lordships to look at all such documents with the utmost distrust.

And if, from the similarity of language and manners, some American seamen have been impressed into His Majesty's service, the blame is imputable to those who have permitted the official documents of citizenship to be so prostituted as to be at last wholly undeserving of any attention or respect, and the British Government has always regretted that this check (slight as it originally was) has been so infinitely abused, and, finally, so completely destroyed, not only for the sake of the Americans themselves, who might thereby suffer the inconvenience of a temporary detention, but for that of the British officers, who were thereby rendered still less capable than before of distinguishing the persons whom it was their duty to impress.

Their Lordships, for the reasons already stated, do not enter with you into any explanations of the rules which governed their conduct on this subject before the war; but as far as regards the prisoners of war sent, either at your or their own request, to prison, from His Majesty's service, their Lordships have no hesitation in stating that they have, in favor of that first principle of civilized society, the allegiance which is due to the land of a man's nativity, been anxious to avoid even the possibility of obliging any American to fight against his country; and they have, therefore, discharged persons from the military service of this country, on evidence of their being Americans, which would not, in ordinary times, have been considered sufficient, even in the opinion and practice of the American consulate here, to obtain their release. And it has happened that several persons have, on their own assertions, or on production of American documents, been so discharged, of whom it has since been discovered that they are natural born subjects of His Majesty, and that such assertions were false, or such documents fraudulently obtained.

But while their Lordships prefer the risk of losing the services of a British subject to that of obliging an American citizen to continue in arms against his country, they cannot, on evidence loose and unsatisfactory, or without any evidence at all, permit such persons to proceed to the United States to bear arms against this country. We are, therefore, to acquaint you that persons discharged to prison from His Majesty's service, as being Americans, cannot be released, unless, in each individual case, you shall produce satisfactory proofs that the person whose exchange you demand, is a natural born American citizen. Whenever such proof shall be produced, the person will be immediately released from prison, upon the usual terms of exchange, if he has been a volunteer into our service; or, if an impressed man, freely and without restriction.

Mr. Beasley to Alexander McLeay, Esq., Secretary of the Transport Board.

HARLEY STREET, May 29, 1813.

SIR: I have received the letter addressed to me by the Board on the 26th instant, communicating the present intentions of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, respecting the American seamen who have been heretofore detained in the British service.

In making those observations in my letter of the 13th of March upon this subject, which their Lordships consider as entering upon a question beyond my competency to discuss, I was influenced solely by a sense of duty. The topic is unfortunately too humiliating to be willingly selected; but painful as its consideration was to myself, and unwelcome as it appears to have been to their Lordships, I cannot regret that I yielded to the necessity of presenting it clearly to their view, since it now appears that their Lordships no longer adhere to their determination, that impressed American seamen must continue to serve His Britannic Majesty or go to prison, to be released only as prisoners of war.

I cannot but lament that, as their Lordships thought it necessary to allude to "misconceptions and misstatements," which they represent that letter to contain, they did not take the trouble to point them out, especially as, in their opinion, they might have been "so easily answered." I lament this the more, as I can discover nothing in it which further reflection and experience do not confirm.

But whatever ground their Lordships' letter affords for retorting such a charge upon themselves, I forbear to notice. If their Lordships do see, in the fraudulent use of documents of American citizenship by British seamen, any excuse for impressing and detaining American seamen in the British navy, and if they do consider such impressment and detention as only a temporary inconvenience to the American seamen, and if they think that the blame of all such impressment and detention is imputable, as their letter insinuates, to the United States, I should utterly despair that our opinions could ever be brought to coincide, and, consequently, that any practical good could result from any effort of mine to effect it. Happily, however, this is not now necessary. The question does not relate to the abuse of documents of American citizenship, whether resulting from forgeries practised here, or frauds committed in the United States; nor is it essential to inquire whether American seamen have been taken through error or design; nor whether their impressment and detention be in conformity with long and general practice in the British navy, or contrary to the wishes of the British Government. The fact is admitted that American seamen have been impressed and held in the service of Great Britain, and their Lordships now declare that, upon satisfactory proof of this national character, they shall be released, either as prisoners of war, or freely and without restriction. The question then is as to the proof.

But, on entering upon this question, we should not overlook the very important consideration that the greater number of these persons having been taken from American vessels, were, whether they did or did not bear documents of their citizenship, taken against the prima facie evidence of their being American citizens. They were deprived of the benefit of this evidence upon the mere suspicion of persons interested in discrediting it, and they have been detained in the British service without any evidence of their being British subjects. It is the British Government, therefore, on which the burden of proof should still lie.

These unfortunate men are, however, in the power of the British Government, and it imposes this burden upon them. To this additional hardship they must therefore submit. We come, then, to its operation.

The official documents of American citizenship are declared by their Lordships to be "wholly undeserving of any attention or respect," and in but few instances has there been an opportunity to obtain any other evidence. Thus, there remains scarcely any documentary testimony to offer on behalf of these men, and a very long time must necessarily elapse before it could be received from America. But, with respect to many of them, I am persuaded that no such evidence need be sought; and, to delay the release of those who are clearly Americans, is not, I trust, now intended by their Lordships.

To prevent, therefore, in some degree, the hardships to which the measures proposed by their Lordships must necessarily subject the far greater part of these unfortunate men, I would suggest that their Lordships should authorize competent persons to examine those who claim to be Americans, and that such as, in the judgment of these persons, are bona fide Americans, should forthwith be released, according to the terms of their Lordships' letter. I will most readily assist at such examinations, and will communicate any documents or papers in my office, which may be considered necessary to facilitate the object. With regard to those who may not be able to satisfy these persons respecting their national character, I will cause proper inquiry to be made at the places to which they respectively claim to belong, and they may be in like manner released, when the proof which may have been deemed necessary shall be received.

Their Lordships will not, I trust, be withheld from the adoption of these or some other equally fair means of investigating, without delay, the claims of these men by any technical incompetency on my part to offer such suggestions. Whatever may be my powers, their Lordships are at all events free to adopt such means as may be equitable; and for the desire they express to "favor that which they consider the first principle of civilized society, the allegiance which is due to the land of a man's nativity," (which principle would be scarcely less violated by depriving his country of his assistance in her defence, than by "obliging him to fight against his country,") I would fain hope they will prefer those which will be the most effectual to the end. Nor, I persuade myself, will the consideration that the United States are now carrying on war for the redress of the wrong done in the detention of these men, prevent their Lordships from redressing the wrong of themselves, not only because it is the duty of a State to remove all just ground of complaint, even on the part of an enemy, but because, by so doing, they would, in a great degree, supersede the necessity of a continuance of the war.

I cannot close this communication without expressing my anxiety at the total silence of their Lordships respecting the numerous representations which have been made by me since the war of individual cases of impressment. In many of these cases the proof has been such as should not have failed to satisfy their Lordships, even disposed as they are to look at all proof in these matters with the utmost distrust, that the men on whose behalf it was offered are bona fide American citizens. Yet in no instance have I heard of any favorable decisions on their claims. I will hope, however, that the course which their Lordships will adopt may speedily remove all those unfavorable impressions, which, with every disposition to give them credit for the most just intentions, could not fail to result from this single fact that, among the thousands of impressed men in the British navy who claim to be Americans, I have not heard of one man who has been freely released and permitted to return to his country since the commencement of hostilities.

I am, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,
R. G. BEASLEY.
ALEXANDER McLEAY, Esq., &c.

Mr. Beasley to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, June 10, 1813.

SIR: The numerous instances of hardships imposed on American citizens by impressment, which came under my observation when I held the office of Consul, could not fail to make a deep impression on my mind. I therefore availed myself of the earliest opportunity to address the British Government on the subject. If any incentive had been wanting to this step, I should have found it in the many communications which I daily received from those unfortunate persons; all asking advice, and some complaining of acts of cruelty by British officers, because having heard of the war they refused to do service. Relying on the justice and magnanimity of the British Government, I considered it would be an insult to demand redress, or even to remonstrate; I therefore contented myself, as you will have seen by my letter to Lord Castlereagh on the subject, with merely representing the facts. But if my confidence was great, so has been my disappointment; for an answer to my letter of the 13th October was not returned until the 26th May, notwithstanding I had frequently called it to the attention of the Government. And it appears I owe this answer to the following circumstance: After having waited so many months for the sentiments of the Government on a topic involving the happiness of thousands of my countrymen, I was induced, as the season was near at hand when many ships would proceed to foreign stations, to issue a circular in answer to the numerous letters which I had received in the interval, stating that the Lords of the Admiralty having declined to release American citizens who had been impressed, there appeared to be no other course than to give themselves up as prisoners of war. Not many of these letters reached the parties before I was informed that "I must not correspond with persons in His Majesty's fleet; and that my circular contained a statement unfounded in fact, for neither before the war nor since had the Lords of the Admiralty declined to release Americans admitted or proved to be such." My letter of the 13th March contains my sentiments on these two points; on the latter I have proved the correctness of my statement by letters from under their Secretary's own hand. In their reply of the 26th May, they say, easy as it would have been to have completely answered the misconceptions and misstatements of that letter, they decline doing so, because it refers to subjects which it is beyond my competency, in the character of agent for prisoners of war, to discuss. And they repeat, "that neither before the war nor since has this country been desirous of retaining in its service any bona fide American citizens;" that, at the same time, they cannot, on evidence loose and unsatisfactory, or without any evidence at all, permit persons to proceed to the United States to bear arms against this country; that, therefore, those who have been discharged from His Majesty's service to prison as being Americans, cannot be released unless, in each individual case, satisfactory proof shall be produced that the person whose release is demanded is a natural born American citizen; and that, when such proof shall be produced, he will be immediately released from prison upon the usual terms of exchange, if he has been a volunteer, or, if an impressed man, freely and without restriction.

To prevent, in some degree, the hardships of the measure thus proposed, I suggested in my letter of the 29th May, that they "would authorize competent persons to examine those who claim to be Americans, and that such as, in the judgment of these persons, are bona fide Americans, should be forthwith released according to the terms of their letter." I offered to assist at such examinations, and to communicate any documents or papers in my possession that might be considered necessary to facilitate the object; and, with regard to those who might not be able to satisfy these persons respecting their national character, I would cause proper inquiry to be made at the places to which they respectively claim to belong concerning the truth of their allegations, that they might, in like manner, be released when the proofs which might have been deemed necessary should be received.

To this proposition I have just received their answer, stating "that they have nothing to add to their former communications on this subject, by which they mean to abide."

Now, that you may know what value to place on the repeated assurances contained in that communication, I beg to state that, since the 9th of March last, I have transmitted documents (many of which came authenticated from the Department of State) on behalf of one hundred and sixty-five persons, impressed and detained on board of British ships, and that they have not thought proper to notice a single case.

What a prospect for those unfortunate men—to linger in prison, or to fight against their country! This is literally their unhappy lot; for it is insulting to talk any longer of evidence, when it is manifest that none that could be produced would be found satisfactory; when they refuse even to examine the cases; and when the very language the victims speak is considered prima facie evidence against them.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

R. G. BEASLEY.

HON. JAMES MONROE, &c.

Extract—Mr. Beasley to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, July 5, 1813.

Notwithstanding the fair promises made some time ago relative to our citizens who had been impressed, there is scarcely an instance of a discharge from the prison-ships.

Mr. Beasley to Mr. Croker.

No. 65, HARLEY STREET,
July 13, 1813.

SIR: I transmit herewith the copy of an application which I made to the Transport Board, on behalf of Jonathan Bigelow, the bearer hereof, an impressed American seaman, as also of the answer I have received.

I now transmit documents in proof of his being an American, as mentioned on the other side, and I have to request that he may be discharged from His Britannic Majesty's service, in conformity to the determination of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty respecting American seamen, as communicated to me by the Transport Board in their letter of 26th April last.

I am, sir, &c.,

R. G. BEASLEY.

J. W. CROKER, Esq., Admiralty Office.

Certificate of his birth granted by the town clerk of the place wherein he was born; certificate of his parents being inhabitants of said place, authenticated by a notary public; and a protection granted by the collector of the district of Penobscot, dated 23d May, 1810.

Mr. Barrow to Mr. Beasley.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, July 14, 1813.

SIR: Having laid before my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty your letter of yesterday's date and its enclosures, requesting the discharge of Jonathan Bigelow, an American, belonging to His Majesty's ship Cornelia, I have their Lordships' commands to acquaint you this man must join his ship, in order that the necessary inquiries may be made into his case. I herewith return the documents, and am, sir, &c.

JOHN BARROW.

LONDON, September 1, 1813.

SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to the case of Jonathan Bigelow, an American seaman, who was impressed into the British service in the year 1807, and has been held therein ever since. In the month of July last, this man being then on leave of absence from the Cornelia, applied to me to procure his discharge from that ship. I made a request to that effect to the Transport Board, informing them that I had examined him, was satisfied he was an American citizen, and that I had documents in my possession, proving that he was a native of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts. To this I received an answer, stating that that Board had no authority to discharge him, but that the documents referred to should be submitted to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and that, in the meantime, he must rejoin his ship at the expiration of his leave, or otherwise he would be liable to be apprehended as a deserter. I immediately made an application to the Admiralty, of which I transmit herewith a copy, and received an answer, a copy of which is also enclosed, stating that he must join his ship, in order that the necessary inquiries might be made into his case. Having no means, at that time, of sending him immediately to the United States, and being fearful that he might be apprehended at the expiration of his leave and treated harshly, besides being considered as a prisoner of war, I consented to his returning to the ship accordingly. Hearing from the man, after having returned to the service, that no steps had been taken in his case, but that, on the contrary, he had been draughted to serve in another ship, I again addressed a letter to the Lords of the Admiralty, recalling his case to their consideration, and repeating my request that he might be discharged. To this I have yet received no answer, and I have just received a letter from the man himself, stating that the Cydnus, to which ship he has been draughted, is on the point of sailing for the West Indies.

In this extraordinary case, I would particularly call your attention to the circumstance of the Lords of the Admiralty desiring, after being put in possession of the documents transmitted in proof of his American nativity, that he should return to the British service, for the purpose, it was alleged, of making the necessary inquiries into his case; their having since taken no notice of it whatever, even after my renewed request, is a clear proof that his discharge was not intended, even should the result of inquiry respecting him be the most satisfactory, and that that motive for desiring his return was assigned merely for the purpose of again obtaining possession of him.

By a letter addressed to me by the Transport Board on the 26th of May last, a copy of which I had the honor of transmitting to you some time ago, the British Government engaged that persons discharged to prison from His Britannic Majesty's service as being Americans, upon my producing satisfactory proofs that they were natural born Americans, should be immediately released from prison, upon the usual terms of exchange, if they had volunteered into the service, or, if impressed men, freely and without restriction. The case of Bigelow, and the fact that, in the months of March and April last, I transmitted documents and made representations in behalf of one hundred and sixty-five unfortunate persons, without having yet ever received a reply to any one case, must convince even those best inclined to believe it, how little the practice of the British Government accords with its profession in favor of impressed American seamen.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

HON. JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

Extract of a letter from R. G. Beasley to John Mason, Esq., dated LONDON, November 25, 1813.

I transmit herewith copies of a correspondence which I have lately had with the Transport Board, relative to some seamen who have been surrendered to prison, as Americans, from British ships of war, from which you will perceive the little prospect which the many unfortunate men, in the same situation, have of being released on documentary evidence. I shall, nevertheless, continue my exertions in their behalf.

Mr. Beasley to Mr. McLeay.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1813.

I have to recall to the consideration of the Board the cases of several persons, claiming to be American citizens, on whose behalf I transmitted particular statements and evidence some time ago, namely, on the 9th of March last, on behalf of ninety-five persons, on the 7th of April, on behalf of thirty, and, on the 24th of April, of forty persons. The only information which I have received from the Board, relative to them, is obtained from the lists of American prisoners which have been transmitted to me; from which it appears that some of those persons have been discharged from the British service as Americans, and sent to prison; some of them, however, are still compelled to remain in the service. I have, therefore, now to request that such of these persons, and those who have been discharged to prison, whose claims to be American citizens appear to be well founded, may be immediately discharged, and allowed to return to the United States.

I transmit herewith particular statements and evidence relative to nineteen seamen who have been discharged from British ships of war, and are now confined on board the prison-ship Nassau at Chatham; and, as the evidence of their being Americans must, I conceive, be considered quite satisfactory, I trust there will be no difficulty in granting their release in conformity to the assurance contained in your letter of the 26th of May last. I am, sir, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

ALEXANDER MCLEAY, Esq.,
Transport Office.

Copy of the statement made on behalf of William Dews, one of the nineteen seamen before mentioned.

It appears from the books of the American consulate office at London, that, in October, 1809, this man was ordered by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to be discharged, as an American, from the Princess of Orange; the protection herewith transmitted is the same which was at that time offered on his behalf by the Consul.

Copy of a letter from Mr. McLeay to Mr. Beasley.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, Oct. 20, 1813.

SIR: I have received and laid before the Commissioners for the transport service, &c., your letter of the 18th ultimo, with its enclosures, claiming the release of nineteen American seamen, represented to have been discharged from British ships of war, and to be now confined as prisoners of war on board the Nassau prison-ship at Chatham; and, in reply, am commanded to acquaint you, that your said application having been submitted to the consideration of the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, their Lordships have directed the Board to acquaint you that William Dews, one of the persons in question, was not discharged in 1809, as represented; that he was not again impressed as represented; and that his documents, as well as all the others, excepting Brainard's, (whose release was ordered on the 25th ultimo,) are of that description which have been so notoriously fraudulent, that their Lordships do not feel satisfied in paying any attention to them; and that they therefore cannot, without satisfactory proof release, as Americans, persons who have been lately serving in His Majesty's ships.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant

ALEX. McLEAY, Secretary.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq., &c.

Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. FRIGATE PRESIDENT,
Boston, Jan. 14, 1813.

SIR: Herewith you will receive two muster-books of His Britannic Majesty's vessels Moselle and Sappho, found on board the British packet Swallow.

As the British have always denied that they retained on board their ships of war American citizens, knowing them to be such, I send you the enclosed, as a public document of their own, to prove how illy such an assertion accords with their practice.

It will appear by these two muster-books that so late as August last, about an eighth part of the Moselle and Sappho's crews were Americans; consequently, if there is only a quarter part of that proportion on board their other vessels, that they have an infinitely greater number of Americans in their service than any American has yet had an idea of.

Any further comment of mine on this subject I consider unnecessary, as the enclosed documents speak but too plainly for themselves.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS.

Secretary of the Navy.

[Correspondence between General Taylor and Captain Barrie, concerning James Balfour, an impressed seaman on board the Dragon.]

Extract of a letter from General Taylor to the Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS, NORFOLK,
November 15, 1813.

Herewith I transmit copies of a letter addressed by me to the officer commanding the enemy's squadron in Lynnhaven, and of Captain Barrie's reply, on the subject of an American on board the Dragon, James Balfour.

This man has been twice impressed into the British service, and has been the last time detained some years.

I have, &c.

Copy of a letter from General Taylor to Captain Barrie.

HEADQUARTERS, NORFOLK,
November 15, 1813.

SIR: Major Somerville, of Maryland, transmitted to me, a few days ago, a letter from James Balfour, now on board your ship, to Robert

Brough; which letter, he stated, had been given to him by you, accompanied by your assurance "that the man would be immediately released on his procuring satisfactory evidence of his birth-place."

I now transmit to you such affidavits as I presume will be entirely satisfactory. I will vouch to you, sir, for the veracity and respectability of the persons who make them; and you will have the best opportunity of testing them by inquiry of the man himself, of the facts stated in them, which, if not true, he cannot corroborate, as there has been no means of concert between him and the persons making them.

Captain Myers, who will have the honor to deliver this, is accompanied by a person to identify Balfour.

I cannot conclude this letter without expressing my sense of the candor and liberality with which you have acted in this affair, and offering you the assurance of my perfect consideration.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT B. TAYLOR.

Brigadier General.

The SENIOR OFFICER, &c.

Copy of a letter from Captain Robert Barrie, of His Britannic Majesty's ship Dragon, to Brigadier General Robert Taylor.

LYNNHAVEN BAY, Nov. 20, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, with its enclosures, relative to the identity of James Balfour.

Major Somerville must have misunderstood my meaning, when he stated me to have assured him, "that the man would be immediately released, on his procuring satisfactory evidence of his birth-place." What I intended the Major to understand, was, that on his procuring the necessary evidence I would discharge the man from the service, but as to granting his unconditional release, it is beyond my power. If it were not, your testimony of the respectability of the parties who have made the affidavits of Balfour's citizenship would be sufficient evidence with me to order his discharge immediately.

I represented this man's case to my superior officer in March last. His reply I have shown to Captain Myers, in which I am directed to dispose of all persons in Balfour's situation as prisoners of war. All I can therefore do, is to send the man to Bermuda as a prisoner. I will also forward the documents you have handed me to my superior officer there, accompanied by my conviction that Balfour is an American, and I will write to Sir John Warren to request that he will order Balfour to be released, or at least admitted to parole, and I have no doubt he will comply with my request.

I beg to assure you that I shall always feel great satisfaction in giving you every proof of my respectful consideration.

ROBERT BARRIE.

Brigadier General TAYLOR, &c.

*Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.SPIRIT AND MANNER IN WHICH THE WAR IS WAGED BY THE ENEMY.

[Communicated to the House, July 31, 1813.]

Mr. MACON, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's Message "which relates to the spirit and manner in which the war had been waged by the enemy," made the following report :

That they have collected and arranged all the testimony on this subject which could, at this time, be procured. This testimony is submitted to the consideration of the House, arranged under the following heads :

First. Bad treatment of American prisoners.

Second. Detention of American prisoners as British subjects, on the plea of nativity in the dominions of Britain, or of naturalization.

Third. Detention of mariners, as prisoners of war, who were in England when the war was declared.

Fourth. Compulsory service of impressed American seamen on board British ships-of-war.

Fifth. Violation of flags of truce.

Sixth. Ransom of American prisoners from Indians in the British service.

Seventh. Pillage and destruction of private property on the Chesapeake Bay, and in the neighboring country.

Eighth. Massacre and burning of American prisoners surrendered to officers of Great Britain, by Indians in the British service. Abandonment of the remains of Americans killed in battle, or murdered after the surrender to the British. The pillage and shooting of American citizens, and the burning of their houses, after surrender to the British under the guarantee of protection.

Ninth. Outrages at Hampton, in Virginia.

The evidence under the first head demonstrates that the British Government has adopted a rigor of regulation unfriendly to the comfort, and apparently unnecessary to the safe keeping, of American prisoners, generally. It shows, also, instances of a departure from the customary rules of war, by the selection and confinement in close prisons of particular persons, and the transportation of them, for undefined causes, from the ports of the British colonies to the island of Great Britain.

The evidence under the second head establishes the fact, that, however the practice of detaining American citizens as British subjects may be regarded as to the principle it involves, that such detentions continue to occur, through the agency of the naval and other commanders of that Government. It proves, too, that, however unwilling to allow other nations to naturalize her subjects, Great Britain is disposed to enforce the obligation entered into by their citizens, when naturalized under her own laws. This practice, even supposing the release of every person thus detained, obviously subjects our captured citizens, upon mere suspicion, to hardships and perils from which they ought to be exempt, according to the established rules in relation to prisoners of war.

The evidence under the third head shows that, while all other American citizens were permitted to depart within a reasonable time after the declaration of war, all mariners who were in the dominions of Great Britain, whether they resorted to her ports, in time of peace, for lawful purposes, or were forced into them under the pretence of illegal commerce, are considered prisoners of war. The injustice of this exception is not more apparent than the jealousy it discloses towards that useful class of our fellow-citizens. But the committee can but remark, that, if the practice of hiring American seamen to navigate British vessels is generally adopted and authorized, and that it is suffered appears from the advertisement of George Maude, the British agent at Port Royal, which is to be found with the testimony collected under the first head, that the naval strength of that empire will be increased in proportion to the number of our seamen in bondage. The present war having changed the relation of the two countries, the pretended right of impressment can no longer be exercised, but the same end may be accomplished by the substitution of this mode. Every seaman thus employed (the terms of whose engagement have not been ascertained) increases the naval strength of the enemy, not only by depriving the United States of his active services, but by enabling Great Britain to carry on, and even extend, her commerce, without diminishing the number of sailors employed in her vessels of war.

The testimony collected under the fourth head proves, that it is the ordinary practice of the officers of British armed vessels to force impressed Americans to serve against their country by threats, by corporal punishment, and even by the fear of immediate execution—an instructing commentary upon the professions of the Government of its readiness to release impressed American seamen, found on board ships of war.

On the evidence collected under the fifth head it is only necessary to observe, that, in one case, (the case of Dr. McKeehan,) the enormity is increased by the circumstance of the flag being divested of every thing of a hostile character, having solely for its object the relief of the wounded and suffering prisoners who were taken at the river Raisin on the 22d January, 1813. The treatment of Dr. McKeehan, not by the allies of Britain, but by the officers of her army, can only be rationally accounted for by the supposition, that it was considered good policy to deter American surgeons from going to the relief of their countrymen, as the Indian surgeons had a more speedy, and effectual mode of relieving their sufferings.

The evidence respecting the ransom of American prisoners from Indians, collected under the sixth head, deserves attention, principally from the policy it indicates, and as it is connected with Indian cruelties. Considering the savages as an auxiliary military force in the pay of Great Britain, the amount of ransom may be regarded as part of their stipulated compensation for military service ; and, as ransoms would be increased, and their value enhanced, by the terror inspired by the most shocking barbarities, it may be fairly concluded, whatever may be the intention of the Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

British Government, that the practice of redeeming captives by pecuniary means will be occasionally quickened, by the butchery of our fellow-citizens, and by indignities offered to their remains, as long as the Indians are employed by the enemy. The justice of this conclusion is confirmed by the testimony of those witnesses who were retained after ransom as prisoners of war.

The testimony collected under the seventh head shows, that the private property of unarmed citizens has been pillaged by the officers and crews of the British vessels of war on our coast, their houses burnt, and places of public worship mutilated and defiled. It appears that the officers, animated by the presence of Admiral Cockburn, particularly distinguished themselves in these exploits. This evidence proves, that they were governed by the combined motives of avarice and revenge; not satisfied with bearing off, for their own convenience, the valuable articles found, the others, which furnished no allurements to their cupidity, were wantonly defaced and destroyed. It has been alleged, in palliation of these acts of wanton cruelty, that a flag sent on shore by the Admiral was fired upon by the American militia. The evidence proves this not to have been the fact. This pretence has been resorted to only to excuse conduct which no circumstances can justify.

The committee forbear to make any observations upon the testimony collected under the eighth head, from a perfect conviction that no person of this or any other nation can read the simple narrative of the different witnesses of the grossest violations of honor, justice, and humanity, without the strongest emotions of indignation and horror. That these outrages were perpetrated by Indians is neither palliation nor excuse. Every civilized nation is answerable for the conduct of the allies under their command, and, while they partake of the advantages of their successes, they are equally partakers of the odium of their crimes. The British forces concerned in the affair of the 22d, at the river Raisin, are more deeply implicated in the infamy of these transactions than by this mode of reasoning, however correct. The massacre of the 23d January, after the capitulation, was perpetrated without any exertion on their part to prevent it; indeed, it is apparent, from all the circumstances, that, if the British officers did not connive at their destruction, they were criminally indifferent about the fate of the wounded prisoners. But what marks more strongly the degradation of the character of the British soldiers is, the refusal of the last offices of humanity to the bodies of the dead. The bodies of our countrymen were exposed to every indignity, and became food for brutes, in the sight of men who affect a sacred regard to the dictates of honor and religion. Low, indeed, is the character of that army which is reduced to the confession that their savage auxiliaries will not permit them to perform the rites of sepulture to the slain. The committee have not been able to discover even the expression of that detestation which such conduct must inspire from the military or civil authority on the Canadian frontier, unless such detestation is to be presumed from the choice of an Indian trophy as an ornament for the legislative hall of Upper Canada.

The committee have considered it their duty to submit the evidence collected under the ninth head of the atrocities committed at Hampton, although these enormities have been committed since their appointment. These barbarities may be rationally considered as the consequence of the example set by the officers of the naval force on our coast. Human turpitude is always progressive, and soldiers are prepared for the perpetration of the most dreadful crimes by the commission of minor offences with impunity. That troops who had been instigated by the example of their officers to plunder the property and burn the houses of unarmed citizens, should proceed to rape and murder, need not excite surprise, however it may inspire horror. For every detestable violation of humanity an excuse is fabricated or found. The wounded prisoners on the Northern frontier were massacred by Indians; the sick murdered; and the women violated at Hampton, by the foreign troops in the pay of Great Britain. These prettexts, admitting them to be true, are as disgraceful as the conduct which made a resort to them necessary. Honor and magnanimity not only forbid the soldier to perpetrate crimes, but require every exertion on his part to prevent them. If, in defiance of discipline, acts of violence are committed upon any individual entitled to protection, the exemplary punishment of the offender can alone vindicate the reputation of the nation by whom he is employed. Whether such exertions were made by the British soldiers, or the character of the British nation thus vindicated, the evidence will show.

The shrieks of the innocent victims of infernal lust, at Hampton, were heard by the American prisoners, but were too weak to reach the ears or disturb the repose of the British officers, whose duty, as men, required them to protect every female whom the fortune of war had thrown into their power. The committee will not dwell on this hateful subject. Human language affords no terms strong enough to express the emotions which the examination of this evidence has awakened; they rejoice that these acts have appeared so incredible to the American people, and, for the honor of human nature, they deeply regret that the evidence so clearly establishes their truth. In the correspondence between the commander of the American and British forces will be found what is equivalent to an admission of the facts by the British commander. The committee have yet to learn that the punishment of the offenders has followed the conviction of their guilt. The power of retaliation being vested by law in the Executive Magistrate, no measure is considered necessary to be proposed but the resolution annexed to this report. As such enormities, instead of inspiring terror, as was probably intended, are, in the opinion of the committee, calculated to produce a contrary effect, they submit, for the consideration of the House, the following resolution:

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to have collected and presented to this House, during the continuance of the present war, evidence of every departure by the enemy from the ordinary modes of conducting war among civilized nations.

No. 1.—Bad treatment of American Prisoners by the British.

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1813.

SIR: I have received your favor of the 22d instant, and hasten to reply to the questions therein, respecting the case of Captain Jeduthan Upton, late commander of the privateer brig Hunter, of Salem. Captain Upton was taken in the month, I believe, of November last, off the Western islands, by the British frigate Phoebe, Captain Hilliard. In chase, Captain Upton, as is usual in such cases, threw his guns overboard to ease his vessel, in hopes by that means to facilitate his escape from the enemy; but this not availing, he was, as above stated, taken and carried into Plymouth, in England, where, on his arrival, he was immediately, with his first lieutenant, Mr. Wayne, put into Mill prison, and refused his parol, on the plea he had not on board, when captured, fourteen mounted carriage guns above the caliber of four pounders. After having been thus closely confined for three or four months in a filthy jail, they were in the month of March taken out and sent on board the prison ship at Chatham, where, when I left England in April last, they still were, in a worse situation, if possible, than in Mill prison. The allowance, sir, to American prisoners, in England, you are acquainted with; it is therefore, not necessary for me to mention it here. It is but justice to state, that the captain of the Phoebe petitioned the Transport Board, and used every exertion in his power to obtain the parols of Captain Upton and Mr. Wayne, but all would not do; they were deaf to his petition, lost as they are to every sentiment of honor, and every principle of humanity.

Except Captain Upton and his first lieutenant, all the rest of his officers and crew were sent on board the prison ship on their first arrival at Plymouth; among them was the doctor of the Hunter, Mr. Carter, who came home in the cartel Robinson Potter. What I have stated respecting the treatment of Captain Upton and Mr. Wayne, I know to be facts, as I had the honor of spending twenty-four hours in Mill prison with them, and heard those facts related by themselves.

Very respectfully, &c. A. COFFIN, Jr.

J. MASON, Esq., Com. Gen. of Prisoners.

NAVY YARD, CHARLESTOWN, June 3, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose to you a deposition respecting the inhuman treatment, which Mr. Nichols, late commander of the private armed ship Decatur, belonging to Newburyport, has received from the British Government at Barbadoes. I have been credibly informed that Captain Nichols is a very respectable and correct man, therefore a fair presumption, that he has not committed himself in such a manner as ought to deprive him of the established rights of a prisoner of war. Any measure which the Government of our country may see proper to adopt in consequence of this communication, I shall readily attend to. I have the honor, &c.

WM. BAINBRIDGE.

HOB. W. JONES, Sec'y Navy.

I, James Foot of Newburyport, in the county of Essex, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, mariner, testify and depose, that I was a prize master on board the private armed brigantine Decatur, of Newburyport, in her late cruise, William Nichols, commander; that, on the 18th day of January, now last past, the said brigantine was captured by His Britannic Majesty's frigate Surprise, commanded by Captain Cochran, and carried into Barbadoes. After our arrival in Barbadoes, Captain Nichols, with the other officers of the Decatur, were paroled. About two months after our arrival, His Britannic Majesty's frigate Vesta arrived in Barbadoes, and through the influence of the commander of the Vesta, Captain Nichols, without any known or pretended cause, was arrested and held in close confinement, without liberty to speak to any of his officers or any other American. The place where Captain Nichols was confined, was about four feet in width, and about seven feet in length, on board a prison ship, where he remained for thirty-four days, as nearly as I can recollect, and was then taken on board His Majesty's ship Tribune, and carried to England. What the cause of the unwarrantable and unjustifiable conduct of the enemy towards Captain Nichols was, I am unable to state; there were several reports in circulation; one was, that he was to be carried to England and held a prisoner until the release of certain men in France, from whom Captain Nichols recaptured his vessel, which had been taken by the British before the commencement of the present war between the two countries: another report was, that he was to be held until the close of the war, on account of his having been active against the enemy, since the commencement of hostilities, and having been fortunate in a former cruise.

JAMES FOOT.

MASSACHUSETTS, Essex, ss:

On this thirty-first day of May, in the year of our Lord 1813, personally appeared James Foot, the subscriber to the foregoing deposition, and made solemn oath that the same is true.

Before me, JACOB GERRISH,
Justice of the Peace.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners, to Alexander Stewart, Esq., United States' Agent for prisoners at Jamaica, dated

MAY 1, 1813.

"I enclose you a copy of an advertisement, said to have been taken from a Jamaica newspaper, apparently put forth by the British agent for prisoners, proposing to hire out American prisoners; you will inquire into this matter, and if it be as has been stated, you will remonstrate strongly against such a practice, and inform me of the practice and the result."

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

[Referred to in the preceding extract.]

PORT ROYAL, Nov. 25, 1812.

Masters of vessels about to proceed to England with convoy, are informed that they may be supplied with a limited number of American seamen (prisoners of war) to assist in navigating their vessels, on the usual terms, by applying to GEORGE MAUDE, Agent.

Extract from a memorial addressed to the Secretary of State, by James Orm, Joseph B. Cook, Thomas Humphries, and others, masters of American vessels, who were prisoners of war in England, and returned to the United States in the cartel ship Robinson Potter.

"We shall now proceed to give as correct a statement as we can of the treatment of our countrymen (prisoners of war) by the British in England. On the arrival at Plymouth of the masters, first mates, supercargoes, and passengers, they are sent to Mill prison, for one day and night; they have an iron bedstead to sleep on, with a small mattress which might easily be put into a countryman's wallet, and a small coarse blanket. The allowance for twenty-four hours, is three small salt herrings, or about the same weight of salted codfish, or half a pound of beef, one and a half pounds of black bread, a little salt, &c. The second day they are paroled and sent to Ashburton, twenty-four miles from Plymouth; they must pay their own expenses to get there. While they are there they are allowed 1s. 3d. per diem, or 8s. 9d. sterling per week. Beef is 10d. per pound, bread in proportion, and every other necessary equally dear. The mates, who have nothing but their pay to live upon, join together, eight or ten in a mess, hire a room, and do their own cooking, washing, &c., and in this way make out to keep from starving. Masters, supercargoes, and passengers generally, have other resources, through their correspondents in England, and make out to live, by great economy, at from 30s. to 35s. sterling per week; the second mates and other officers are sent on board the different prison ships. On board some of them they are treated by the commanding officer as well as the nature of their situation will admit; on board of some others, they are very badly treated. This, it will naturally occur to you, sir, is owing to the different characters of the different commanders. Their allowance is ten and a half pounds of brown bread, two and a half pounds beef, two pounds bad fish, two pounds potatoes, and ten ounces barley per week, for each man, and five ounces salt per week, for ten men. The prison ships are kept very filthy, and the prisoners are confined below at 4 P. M., and are kept in that situation until 7 or 8 A. M. At Portsmouth, particularly, they are very sickly, and we are informed die very fast, some days from eight to ten; in fact, they are very sickly on board all of them; several of this description came home in the Robinson Potter cartel, and had, when they came on board, the appearance of having made their escape from a church-yard. It is not perhaps amiss, that we should state what we firmly believe; that is, it is the policy of the British Government to select the sickly to be first sent in cartels, and keep the hale and hardy seamen until they become sickly; thus rendering the whole of those gallant sons of Neptune, who escape death, when they return to their homes, at least for some time, perfectly useless to themselves, and quite so to their country, from their debilitated state; and, in fact, the probability is, that many of them will carry to their graves the indelible stamp upon their constitutions of the treatment which they received on board British prison-ships; for that nation seems to have lost its boasted humanity, and if we did not find the word in their vocabulary, we should suppose it had never found a place there. Many of the seamen, prisoners on board those prison-ships, are impressed Americans, who have given themselves up, refusing to fight against their country.

"Four hundred on board the fleet in the Mediterranean, a short time before we left England, surrendered themselves, and were sent to Gibraltar and England; several of them were most severely flogged for refusing to do their duty, were put in irons, and most of them, to their immortal credit, submitted to the severest punishment in preference to assist the enemies of their country. Some of us, whose signatures are annexed, were witnesses to the cruel fact. A tablet of gold is not rich enough to inscribe the names of such men upon; and when a country can boast of such seamen, she has nothing to fear from the enemy on the ocean on any equal footing. Captain Jeduthan Upton, late master of the private armed brig Hunter, of Salem, of fourteen guns, because he threw them overboard in chase, was not allowed his parole, but kept in close confinement for a long time in Mill prison, and lately has been sent on board a prison-ship at Chatham. We mention these facts in hopes that Government will retaliate exactly in the same way. Captain Samuel Turner, late master of the Purseschooner, of New York, was taken on his passage to France, in October, 1811, prior to the war, and in retaking his vessel, the prize master, a British midshipman, was killed; he arrived safely in France, and on his return to America, was again taken, in June, 1812, and sent to England, when being recognised, he was immediately arrested and sent on board the St. Salvador, Admiral Calder's flag ship, at Plymouth, where he remained a close prisoner until about January or February last, when he was sent on board the prison-ship at Chatham, where we fear he will remain until death relieves him; he has been very ill treated, much abused, put in irons, and often threatened to be hanged. These facts, some of us who sign this were witness to. We pray, in the name of justice, that Government will take, without delay, the case of Captain Turner, into their serious consideration; it is a case which we think demands it; and the only way to prevent that nation from committing further outrages so degrading to human nature. We find in Roman history, that an injury or insult offered to a Roman citizen by a foreign Power, was considered as an insult offered to the whole Roman nation, and hope this will also be the American creed, because we believe it will be the surest way of putting a stop to those indignities which Americans have so often been obliged to suffer. We are, however, no advocates for cruelty, but, on the contrary, for lenity; yet we still believe that, in certain cases, retaliation is not only necessary, but becomes a duty to prevent further cruelties on the part of an enemy."

NASSAU, November 27, 1812.

DEAR BROTHER: I embrace this, the earliest opportunity of communicating to you, that, on the 9th instant, fifteen days out, we fell in with and captured the fine copper-bottomed ship Venus, vessel and cargo worth at least twenty-five thousand dollars. On the twelfth, pursuing our course, and within five day's run of your place, we were captured by His Majesty's sloop Moselle, George Moubray, commander, and brought into this place. We remained on board the sloop two or three days, and on the 19th were transferred from thence to the prison-ship, where we are now imprisoned, with an allowance of six ounces of bread, three gills of rice, eight ounces of the worst of beef, including bone, which is as much as meat, with as much brackish water as we can use; guarded day and night by ten or fifteen savage Africans, who are total strangers to humanity, and confined every evening at sundown, not to be released until sun-rise, abused to the lowest degree by the guard, and compelled to find salt for, and cook, our own victuals with green mangoes. None of us are ever permitted, under any conditions whatever, to visit the shores, with many other barbarous acts, which are too numerous to describe. This will be conveyed by the cartel sloop, Captain Cooper, being the second cartel which has sailed since our arrival here.

A schooner from Baltimore was only allowed eight men, and Cooper, who brought sixty-four prisoners, is only allowed eighteen in return, while we, eighteen in number, are detained in this miserable place; for which we cannot assign any reason, except to punish us as privateersmen, or as hostages for those twelve lately detained in Charleston; this last is the general belief, and as such, I deem a communication of the circumstance essential to Commodore Dent, commander of the Southern station, that he may look to it and inquire the cause why Americans are to be detained here two or three months, while more prisoners have been received here, by a great many, than what have been sent to the United States. Men who have arrived here since we, have been sent off; they proceed with no degree of regularity in the exchange of prisoners, and act in open contradiction to everything right, and I really believe that, except you make known the circumstances, and use some favorable exertions, that some of us will be intentionally detained until the end of our present contest with Great Britain.

As I wish your exertions for our exchange, I have subjoined a list of those who are thus miserably treated, that we may be demanded in a proper way. The Rapid's crew have been imprisoned here nearly three months, and have now no prospect of getting away, while the crews of two other privateers have been released.

Crew of the Lovely Lass.—Lieutenant Autine Lambert, William L. Robeson, William Thomas, John Crandel, David Ashton, John Gamache, John Hynes, Darius Swain, and John McKenzie.

Rapid's Crew.—Captain Lameson, Peter La Vella, George Alexander, James T. Miller, Francis Martin, and Gaugion Bigulows.

Other Prisoners.—Simon West and Matthew Bridge.

I wrote Mr. Peck, and requested him to forward me a letter of introduction to some one here, and also a protection showing that I am an American. As it is possible that he may not get my letter, you will notice my request, and pay that attention which it deserves. I mentioned, in my letter to Mr. Peck, that any funds which I received here would be returned on application, as my expenditures will, through an economical principle, be as small as possible. I indulge the hope that you will conform to my wishes in this particular, and also inform Mr. Kelly of our imprisonment here, and request his influence in facilitating our exchange, with any other service.

We have no chance of gaining information here. Every person uses every exertion to keep us in ignorance; however, we are enabled to say, that the English prisoners have generally combined in speaking well of the treatment they received in the United States.

I am, your affectionate brother,

WM. L. ROBESON.

Capt. THOMAS J. ROBESON.

N. B. The Moselle, Rhodian, and Variable, three men of war, have just convoyed five or six vessels over the bar, bound to some part of England; it is supposed that they will return to cruise off Charleston. In case you address or send anything for me to this place, you will direct to the care of Messrs. Bain, Dunshe, & Co., merchants here. I am, yours, &c.

W. L. R.

HARTFORD, May 9, 1813.

SIR: Annexed is Captain Samuel Chew's deposition, taken before Judge Edwards, at New Haven. We expected it in season to have forwarded it by Mr. Dodd, but received it last evening by Mr. Huntington, the United States' Attorney for Connecticut district, and now forward it to you per mail. Yours, respectfully.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

CONNECTICUT DISTRICT, ss.

On this day, the 7th of May, in the year of our Lord, eighteen hundred and thirteen, personally came before me, Pierpont Edwards, Judge of the district court of the United States, for the district aforesaid, Samuel Chew, of the city of New Haven, in the said district, and being duly sworn, deposeeth, That he was at Bridgetown, in the Island of Barbadoes, in the West Indies, in the month of February now last past; that, on board the prison-ship at Barbadoes, there were confined about five hundred and twenty-three American prisoners, of the crews of private armed vessels of the United States and merchantmen, captured since the war. At the time the deponent was at Barbadoes the American prisoners were supplied with bread and some meat; as to vegetables, the deponent was not informed. The regulations on board the said prison-ship compelled the prisoners to go below decks, where they were confined at evening and until morning; as many as could were suspended in hammocks, and still there was not sufficient room below them for all to lie down. In this respect the situation of the prisoners was not only extremely uncomfortable, but hazardous, and more especially, should there be, as was apprehended, a scarcity of provisions during the approaching hot months. The deponent was not permitted to go on board said prison-ship, but derived his information from masters of vessels, prisoners at said island, who were allowed occasionally to go on board said prison-ship, with whom the deponent is personally acquainted, and in whose representations he has the most perfect confidence, and entertains no doubt of the facts by them stated; and this statement is given at the request of the friends of some of the prisoners at Barbadoes, particularly of the crew of the privateer Blockade, at Hartford.

PIERPONT EDWARDS,
District Judge of Connecticut Dist.

I, Pierpont Edwards, Judge of the district court of the United States for the Connecticut district, do hereby certify and make known to all whom it may concern, that Captain Samuel Chew, the within named deponent, is a gentleman to me well known, having known him for many years; he is the son of Captain Samuel Chew, late of the city of New Haven, deceased, and who fell by a cannon ball on board an American vessel during the Revolutionary war; that the said deponent is a man of strict integrity, and attached to the Constitution and Government of the United States, and the most perfect confidence is due to his said representations so as aforesaid sworn to.

PIERPONT EDWARDS,
District Judge of Connecticut Dist.

MILVILLE PRISON, August 30, 1812.

SIR: We the subscribers, for ourselves and our countrymen, now confined as prisoners of war in Milville prison, Halifax, Nova Scotia, beg leave to represent to the American Government, that most of us have, for years past, made commerce our sole employment and hope, in which, for seven years or more, we have often been wantonly robbed by the English of what we had acquired by industry and danger, and while they stripped us of our property, they often treated us with the greatest indignity, and even barbarity.

We have seen and known that they have violated the sacred privilege of individual liberty and the law of nations; we are conscious of the long forbearance of our Government, and their repeated calls upon the honor and justice of the British nation, which, instead of redress, added other injuries; and when the hope of amicable remuneration had failed, and for retaliation our Government was forced to the last resort, an appeal to arms, we felt the justness of our cause, and hoped for the blessing of Heaven for success. To serve our country and to make up the losses which we had sustained, we, under commissions from the President of the United States, entered on board of privateers, and have unfortunately been captured by the British. We would state, that, in many instances after we had struck our colors, we were fired upon by cannon and muskets, by broadsides and volleys, and some of our men killed, and, after our captors had come on board, some of us have been struck and severely wounded with cutlasses, without the least provocation for such inhumanity. Our American protections have been forced from us and destroyed, and some native American citizens have been taken out of our privateers and put on board British ships, and there obliged to serve. Most of us have been robbed of everything, even of the necessary clothing. When we were going from the ships to prison, the officers would not permit us to take our clothing and baggage with us, but pledged themselves that they should be sent to prison; but, disregarding their honor, we have lost all. Some of us have been marched thirty, and some sixty, and some one hundred and sixty miles over a miserable country, forced along beyond our strength, half starved, and some in irons. Our allowance, each man per day, one pound and a half of bread, a half pound of poor beef, well proportioned with bone, one gill of peas, one-third of an ounce of salt. We are without wearing apparel and without money, or any means of procuring them. A cold Winter in this wretched country fast approaches, and in our destitute situation we must endure everything, and many of us must perish. There are now of us in prison upwards of twelve hundred. Every art has been practised by the English officers to excite disaffection in our men to the American Government, and to induce them to enter into the English service. Necessity may oblige some to desert us and enter into British servitude, but we trust that speedy relief from our Government will save them from that wretched alternative of perishing with want or joining our enemies. For ourselves and the rest of the prisoners, we must say, we have now no fortunes to devote to the service of our country, but we have hearts which yet feel warmly the general impulse, and which we pledge, if opportunity ever again presents, to devote in the interest and service of our country.

We now are sufferers, but we will cheerfully suffer every hardship of war rather than sue for dishonorable peace. We respectfully request an exchange or some provision for relief. We feel the fullest confidence in our Government, and that we need only to apprise them of our situation to insure their assistance and protection.

No. 2.

Detention of American Prisoners as British subjects.

OFFICE COMM'RY GEN'L OF PRISONERS,

WASHINGTON, June 10, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the copy of a letter from Captain Stewart, commanding the United States' naval forces at Norfolk, dated the 20th of May, to Admiral Warren, and that of a letter from Rear Admiral Cockburn, dated the 21st of May, in reply, relative to a most unjustifiable act of Commodore Beresford, as to part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen, at the mouth of the Delaware. Leaving the general question of the interference of Commodore Beresford with the prisoners of war returning on parole, and the exaction made by him in consequence of the irregular power thus assumed, on the ground on which Captain Stewart has very properly placed it, I will remark, that Captain Stewart was certainly misapprehended by Admiral Cockburn, in attributing to him the intention of conveying a threat, as to the final detention of two of the American prisoners. On the contrary, the expression used by Captain Stewart communicates, in very plain terms, the decision of this Government, then already made, that four of His Britannic Majesty's subjects should be immediately selected and held in durance, subject to the same treatment in all respects, &c.

And I have now to inform you, sir, that, in virtue of this decision, and by an order from this office, the Marshal of Massachusetts has designated, and placed in close confinement, William Kitto, carpenter, and Thomas Deddingfield, boatswain of the late British packet Swallow, and John Squirrel and James Russel, seamen of the Dragon seventy-four, subjects of His Britannic Majesty, to be held responsible for the safety of John Stephens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, part of the crew of the late United States' brig Vixen.

I flatter myself, sir, that this subject will command your early attention, and that you will cause the officer and seamen of the Vixen to be immediately released and returned to this country, according to their destination when taken from the cartel.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant. J. MASON.

To Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

H. M. S. POICTIERS, May 8, 1813.

SIR: I am sorry I am under the necessity of detaining John Stevens and Thomas King, late of the Vixen, in consequence of their being British subjects.

I am, sir, your obedient servant.

J. P. BERESFORD.

To Lieutenant DRAYTON.

U. S. FRIGATE CONSTELLATION,

Off Norfolk, May 20, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to represent to your Excellency, that a part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen, returning from Jamaica on parole as prisoners of war, were, on entering the Delaware, taken out of the flag of truce by Commodore Beresford, commanding on that station, and detained until a part of the crew of the Poictiers, then prisoners at Philadelphia, were demanded by him and sent down in exchange; that ultimately he detained on board the Poictiers John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, late of the United States' brig Vixen, on the plea of their being subjects of His Britannic Majesty.

This violation of the rights of prisoners on parole is so contrary to the usage of all civilized nations, that I trust your Excellency will give such instructions upon that head as will prevent a similar violation in future.

I have it in command, from my Government, to state to your Excellency that, in retaliation for so violent and unjust a procedure, on the part of Commodore Beresford, in detaining the above Mr. John Stevens and Thomas King, that four subjects of His Britannic Majesty will be immediately selected and held in durance, subject to the same treatment, in all respects, which may be shown towards the aforesaid two persons during their detention. I hope your Excellency will give this subject your earliest attention, and direct the release of Mr. Stevens and Thomas King, who have been so improperly detained on board the Poictiers.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

CHARLES STEWART,

Com. at Norfolk.

Right Hon. SIR JOHN B. WARREN.

Admiral of the Blue, &c.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

SHIP MARLBOROUGH,
In Lynhaven Bay, May 21, 1813.

SIR: In the absence of Sir John Warren, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter under date of the 20th current, complaining of the conduct of Commodore Beresford towards some American prisoners of war returning to Philadelphia on parole, and of his having detained on board the Poitiers Mr. John Stevens and Thomas King.

No report of these circumstances have yet reached Sir John Warren or myself from Commodore Beresford; but I have no hesitation in assuring you, sir, that every inquiry would have been made into them, and every satisfaction and explanation thereon, which the case might have required, would have been offered to your Government and yourself, with the least possible delay, had it not been for the threat with which your representation on this subject is accompanied, the tenor of which being likely to produce an entire change in the aspect of our communications, and particularly in what relates to the individuals which the fate of war has placed within the power of our respective nations, it totally precludes the possibility of my entering further into the subject than to assure you your letter shall be transmitted to the right honorable the Commander-in-Chief by the earliest opportunity, and whenever his answer arrives it shall be forwarded to you without delay.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high consideration, your most obedient humble servant,

G. COCKBURN, Rear Admiral.

Captain STEWART, &c.

SHARK, PORT ROYAL, (Jamaica,)
March 20, 1813.

SIR: Captain Moubray, of His Majesty's sloop Moselle, has just sent to me the copy of a letter from you to him, and another to Mr. Cook, of His Majesty's late sloop Rhodian, dated the 25th ult., respecting six men* mentioned in the margin, who were sent here from the Bahamas as having been taken in the American privateer Sarah Ann, and supposed to be subjects of His Majesty; but, as no proof to what country they belong has been adduced, it has never been my intention to bring them to trial, and they are at present on board the prison ships, waiting an exchange of prisoners.

I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,
CHARLES STIRLING,
Vice Admiral.

CHARLES R. SIMPSON, Esq.

HARLEM, June 1, 1813.

SIR: I beg leave to refer you to a communication which took place some time in the Autumn or Winter preceding, between Mr. Baker, His Majesty's late agent for prisoners of war, and Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, respecting six of the crew of the late American privateer Sarah Ann, Richard Moon, captured by His Majesty's sloop Rhodian, John George Ross, Esq., Commander, whose names are inserted in the margin, and who, it appears, were sent to Jamaica, to which station the Rhodian belonged, on suspicion of their being subjects of His Majesty. And I further request your attention to a letter from Major General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated Headquarters, Charleston, 4th of November, 1812, from which it appears that twelve of His Majesty's subjects, then prisoners of war at Charleston, were held in prison to answer in their persons for the fate of the six men, of the Sarah Ann privateer, sent to Jamaica.

* Edward Dick, Thomas Rodgers, Adam Taylor, John Gaul, Mike Pluck, George G. Roberts.

I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter from Vice Admiral Stirling, commanding His Majesty's ships of war on the Jamaica station, to Mr. Simpson, late sub-agent for prisoners of war at Charleston, from which you will perceive, that the six men of the Sarah Ann are considered by the Admiral as American prisoners generally, and are now on board a prison ship, in common with other American prisoners.

Having given you this information with respect to the six men of the Sarah Ann privateer, I have to request you will take the necessary measures to have the contingent responsibility which it was thought proper to attach to the persons of twelve British seamen, now in prison at Charleston, taken off, and that they may be informed thereof.

I understand that John Gaul, one of the six men, was paroled, and arrived at Georgetown, South Carolina, in the brig Cyprus, and that he has reported himself to the Marshal, who informed Mr. Simpson "that he had sent on to the Department of State his parole."

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most humble servant,

THOMAS BARCLAY.

OFFICE COMM'Y GEN'L OF PRISONERS,
Washington, June 9, 1813.

SIR: I learn, with pleasure, by the letter you did me the honor to address me on the 1st instant, and the letter from Admiral Stirling you have enclosed, that the six men belonging to the American privateer Sarah Ann, detained in October last, and sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects, have been restored to the ordinary state of prisoners of war, to wait an exchange, and that there is now no intention to bring them to trial.

I very cheerfully comply with your request, sir, and have this day directed the Marshal of South Carolina to restore in like manner, to the ordinary state of prisoners of war, the twelve British seamen, confined under the orders of this Government, by him, and to inform them that the responsibility attached to their persons for the safety of the men of the Sarah Ann has been taken off.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,
J. MASON.
Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

CHILICOTHE, June 8, 1813.

SIR: I feel it my duty to lay before you the case of William McDowel Scott, late of Detroit, an unfortunate fellow-citizen, who has been seized and apprehended by the British commanding officer at Detroit and sent to Quebec, where he is now confined under pretence of being a British subject, and one found in arms in behalf of the United States against that Government.

William McDowel Scott is a native of Ireland, and emigrated to the United States about eighteen years since. He resided for some years in the State of New York, and in the Summer of 1800, he came to Detroit, established himself as a physician, and has ever since resided there. He has been naturalized agreeably to the laws of the United States, and this fact is well known to the British Government: and both in the Territory of Indiana, before that Territory was divided, and subsequently in the Territory of Michigan, he has held, and filled with respect and fidelity, some of the first offices in those two Territories.

Such, for example, as a justice of the peace and a judge of the common pleas in the Indiana Territory, and subsequently Marshal of the Territory of Michigan.

In all these offices, sir, and in every other situation, in which Doctor Scott's public and political character has or can be viewed, he has uniformly manifested an undeviating attachment to the principles of our Constitution and the Administration of this Government.

His support, in the present cause, during the time that General Hull lay at Sandwich and Detroit, was not outdone by any person whatever. In fact it was his unwearied exertions that have provoked and spirited up the British to that line of conduct and persecution they are now pursuing towards him.

Proctor, who sent him from Detroit, and Sir George Prevost, who received him at Fort George and forwarded him to Quebec, threaten to treat him with all the severities authorized by the laws of nations and usages of war, in cases of an actual bona fide British subject found in arms against that Government.

I do not, for myself, however, entertain a belief that they will dare to put their threats into execution to their full extent. But, sir, without the interference of the Government, they will detain him during the war, and they will make his life so wretched and miserable that death would be a welcome messenger.

I hope, sir, the occasion will be a sufficient apology for obtruding this communication upon you. I am amongst the number of those who have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with you. But General Taylor, who I look to as the bearer of it, is a gentleman to whom I am personally known, and who has likewise a pretty correct knowledge of the character of Doctor Scott.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

E. BRUSH.

Extract of a letter from John Mitchell, Esq., agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, to the Secretary of State, dated

MAY 28, 1813.

"I have just been informed by the agent for prisoners, that Mr. John Light, of the Julian Smith, a privateer commanded by Captain Henry Cooper, will be detained here in consequence of his having, previous to the war, taken the oath of allegiance in this province, (Nova Scotia,) and commanded a vessel out of this place (Halifax.) Mr. Light was lieutenant of the privateer captured by the Nymph, the 12th May, 1813."

H. M. S. POICTIERS, May 8, 1813.

SIR: I am sorry I am under the necessity of detaining J. Stevens and T. King, late of the Vixen, in consequence of their being British subjects.

I am, sir, your very obedient servant,

J. P. BERESFORD.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 17, 1813.

SIR: You are hereby authorized and instructed to address a letter to Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, representing the following facts and determination, viz: That a part of the officers and crew of the United States' brig Vixen were returning from Jamaica, on parole, as prisoners of war, and entering the Delaware, when Commodore Beresford caused them to be brought on board the Poictiers, and detained until a part of the crew of that ship, whom he demanded in exchange, were sent down from Philadelphia; that ultimately, he detained John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, two of the aforesaid crew of the Vixen, on the plea of their being British subjects, as appears by a letter from Commodore Beresford to Lieutenant Drayton, late first of the brig Vixen; and that you are commanded explicitly to declare, that, in retaliation for the violent and unjust detention of the said John Stevens and Thomas King, the Government of the United States will immediately cause four British subjects to be selected and held in duress, subject to the same treatment, in all respects, that the said John Stevens and Thomas King may receive during their detention.

On the receipt of the Admiral's answer, you will communicate the same to me without delay.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. JONES.

SIR: I think it my duty to lay before the Department, that, on the arrival at Quebec of the American prisoners of war, surrendered at Queenstown, they were mustered and examined by British officers appointed to that duty, and every native born of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland sequestered and sent on board a ship of war then in that harbor. The vessel, in a few days thereafter, sailed for England, with those persons on board.

Between fifteen and twenty persons were thus taken from us, principally natives of Ireland, several of whom were known by their platoon officers to be naturalized citizens of the United States, and others to have been long residents within the same. One in particular, whose name has escaped me, besides having complied with all the conditions of our naturalization laws, was represented by his officers to have left a wife and five children, all of them born within the State of New York.

I distinctly understood, as well from the officers who came on board the prison-ship for the above purpose, as from others, with whom I remonstrated on this subject, that it was the determination of the British Government, as expressed through Sir George Prevost, to punish every man, whom it might subject to its power, found in arms against the British King contrary to his native allegiance.

I have the honor to be, &c.

LONDON, March 1, 1813.

SIR: Annexed you have a copy of a letter from Henry Kelly, in behalf of himself and twenty-two persons. He states that they are all citizens of the United States, and have wives and families there; that they were taken last October, in Upper Canada, and that they were sent to this country because they were born within the British dominions. I am, respectfully, &c.

ON BOARD H. M. S. NAMUR, lying at the Nore, Feb. 6, 1813.

SIR: This is to inform you of the under named twenty-three American soldiers belonging to the 13th, 6th, and 1st, regiments of the United States' armies. We were taken on the 13th of October, in Upper Canada. The reason of their sending us twenty-three here, is, we were born in the British dominions, though we are all citizens of the United States, and have our wives and children there. We are in a very miserable situation for clothing, having drawn no winter clothes before we were taken. We, therefore, hope you will send us some relief to shelter us from the inclemency of the weather.

Sir, I remain your obedient servant,

HENRY KELLY.

Extract of a letter from Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren to the Secretary of State, dated

BERMUDA, March 8, 1813.

The Secretary of State to Admiral Warren (extract) dated April 16, 1813.

"It appears by your letter (of the 8th of March, from Bermuda) that five only of the seamen that were taken on board the Nautilus and sent to England, in confinement, have been returned. No account is given of the sixth. Orders have been issued for the release of ten of the twelve men, who, on the principle of retaliation, were confined by Commodore Rodgers at Boston. You will be sensible that it will be impossible, on that principle, to discharge the other two men until the sixth American seaman is returned, or such an explanation given of the cause of his detention, as, according to the circumstances of the case, regarding the conduct of the British Government towards American seamen under similar circumstances, ought to be satisfactory."

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant F. H. Babbitt to Master Commandant Wm. M. Crane, of the United States' Navy, (late of the United States' brig Nautilus), dated

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 13, 1812.

Enclosed I send you a description of the proportion of our little crew, who have been so debased and traitorous as to enter the service of our enemy. Also, a list* of those gallant fellows, whose glory it would have been to have lost their lives in the service of their country, and whose misfortune it has been to cross the Atlantic on suspicion of their being British subjects: four of them being native born American, and two naturalized citizens. A list of men said to have entered on board His Majesty's frigate Shannon, Commodore Broke. Their description, as far as known.

Jesse Bates, seaman; about five feet nine inches high, dark hair and complexion, dark snapping eyes, has an impediment in his speech, and at times affects lunacy; has a wife and family in Boston, Massachusetts.

Samuel Lang, marine, born in Kentucky, five feet eight inches high, or thereabouts, and is supposed to be with Captain Hall, of the United States' marines, New York.

John Young, marine, five feet five inches high, large mouth, enlisted with Captain Hall, Navy Yard, New York; when addressed, or is addressing an officer, casts down his eyes. For his particular description, as well as that of John Rose, marine, about five feet eight inches high, brown hair, full face, thick set, and a scowl in his countenance, refer to Captain John Hall.

John O'Neal, seaman, about twenty-five years of age, five feet five inches high, dark hair, sharp face, dark eyes, thick set, and was shipped at Norfolk, Virginia, previous to your taking command of the Nautilus.

William Jones, ordinary seamen, about five feet eight inches high, light hair, twenty-four years of age, full face, thick set, downcast look, and is a very alert man; entered at New York, April last.

Sir John Borlase Warren to Mr. Monroe.

HALIFAX, September 30, 1812.

SIR: Having received information that a most unauthorized act has been committed by Commodore Rodgers, in forcibly seizing twelve British seamen, prisoners of war, late belonging to the Guerriere, and taking them out of the English cartel brig Endeavor, on her passage down the harbor of Boston, after they had been regularly embarked on board of her for exchange, agreeable to the arrangements settled between the two countries, and that the said British seamen, so seized, are now detained on board the United States' frigate President, as hostages; I feel myself called upon to request, sir, your most serious attention to a measure so fraught with mischief and inconvenience, destructive of the good faith of a flag of truce, and the sacred protection of a cartel. I should be extremely sorry that the imprudent act of an officer should involve consequences so particularly severe as the present instance must naturally produce if repeated; and although it is very much my wish, during the continuance of the differences existing between the two countries, to adopt every measure that might render the effect of war less rigorous, yet in another point of view, the conviction of the duty I owe my country would, in the event of such grievances, as I have already stated, being continued, not admit of any hesitation in retaliatory decisions: but as I am strongly persuaded of the high liberality of your sentiments, and that the act complained of has originated entirely with the officer who committed it, and that it will be as censurable in your consideration as it deserves, I rely upon your taking such steps as will prevent a recurrence of conduct so extremely reprehensible in every shape.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient and most faithful humble servant,

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,
Admiral of the Blue, &c.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., Sec'y of State.

Mr. Monroe to Sir John Borlase Warren.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Oct. 28, 1812.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 30th September, complaining that Commodore Rodgers, commanding a squadron of the United States' Navy at the port of Boston, had taken twelve British seamen, lately belonging to His Britannic Majesty's ship the Guerriere, from a cartel in the harbor of Boston, and that he detained them on board the President, a frigate of the United States, as hostages.

I am instructed to inform you that inquiry shall be made into the circumstances attending, and the causes which produced, the act of which you complain, and that such measures will be taken, on a knowledge of them, as may comport with the rights of both nations, and may be proper in the case to which they relate.

I beg you, sir, to be assured, that it is the sincere desire of the President, to see (and to promote, so far as depends on the United States) that the war which exists between our countries be conducted with the utmost regard to humanity.

I have the honor, &c.

J. MONROE.

Two others were detained, John Wade and Thomas Hutchins, but were given up—the former on Captain Jones assuring Captain Beresford he knew him to be a native citizen; the latter on a like assurance from D. Extract of a letter from Major General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, CHARLESTON,
November 4, 1812.

"Information having been given upon oath to Lieutenant Grandison, who, at present, commands the Naval department here, that six American seamen, who had been taken prisoners on board our privateers, had been sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects for treason, he called upon the Marshal to retain double that number of British seamen as hostages. The Marshal, in consequence of instructions from the Department of State, asked my advice on the subject, and I have given my opinion that they ought to be detained, until the pleasure of the President shall be known. The testimony of Captain Moon is herewith. I hope, sir, you will have the goodness to have this business put in the proper train to have the President's pleasure on this subject communicated to the Marshal."

Copy of a letter from Captain Moon, of the privateer Sarah Ann.

NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE,
October 14, 1812.

Six of my crew, claimed as British subjects, were this day taken out of jail and put on board His Majesty's brig the Sappho, and sailed for Jamaica, where, it is said, they are to be tried for their lives; consequently, I questioned each respectively as to the place of their nativity, and title to protection by the American Government, when they stated as follows, to wit:

David Dick, seaman, that he was born in the north of Ireland, but has resided in the United States ever since the year 1793; has served ten years in the United States' Navy, viz: On board the frigates Chesapeake, President, Constitution, John Adams, and schooner Enterprise, and gunboat No 2. David Dick, shoemaker, in Alexandria, is his uncle. Dick is about five feet six and a half inches high, dark hair, has a scar on his left elbow, and one on each wrist; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

John Gaul, seaman, says he was born in Marblehead, State of Massachusetts; where his parents, brothers, and sisters, now reside; is married in New York and his wife (Mary Gaul) lives in Roosevelt street, No 37; has a regular discharge from the Navy of the United States, by Captain Hugh G. Campbell, dated at St. Mary's, Georgia, 14th August, 1812; says he has served on board the United States' brig Vixen, gunboats No. 10 and 158, from the last of which he was discharged. Gaul is twenty-seven years of age, about five feet seven inches high, brown hair, light complexion; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

Michael Pluck, ordinary seaman, says he was born in Baltimore; his parents are dead, but is known by William Douland, Thomas Turner, and McDonald of Baltimore; has a sister in some part of Pennsylvania, whose name is Ann Welsh; was never at sea before; never had a protection. Pluck is twenty-six years old, five feet six and a half inches high, and has a scar on his left cheek bone; entered on board the Sarah Ann at Baltimore.

Thomas Rodgers, seaman, says that he was born in Waterford, Ireland, but has resided many years in the United States, and has been duly naturalized, a copy of which naturalization is filed in the custom-house at Baltimore; is known by Joseph Carey and Tom Rodgers, cork cutters, both of Baltimore; has a wife and three children in Baltimore; has lost his protection, but requests Joseph Carey to do all he can to effect his discharge from the British. Rodgers entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

George Roberts, a colored man and seaman. This man I had not an opportunity of questioning; but I know him to be a native born citizen of the United States, of which fact he had every sufficient document, together with free papers. Roberts entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore, where he is married.

Sonty Taylor, boy, says he was born in Hackensack, New Jersey, but has neither friends, relations, not acquaintance there; says Jane Snowden, of Savannah, Georgia, is his mother; never had a protection. Taylor is fifteen years old, has brown hair and light complexion; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Savannah.

beg leave to inform you, that it appears the said man is married in England, has been eight years in His Majesty's service, and received a pension from Government; under these circumstances, and the man never having made any application for his discharge from prison, he continues on board the Statira.

JOHN BORLASE WARREN.

Extract of a letter from William H. Savage, late Agent for American Seamen and Commerce at Jamaica, to the Secretary of State, dated

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1, 1812.

"I take the liberty to enclose you copies of a correspondence which took place between Vice Admiral Stirling (commanding on the Jamaica station) and myself, since the declaration of war. I should have furnished it to you at an earlier period, but an accident prevented, which I was not aware of until my arrival at this city."

Copy of my letter to Vice Admiral Stirling, commanding on the Jamaica station, on the subject of American seamen, after the declaration of war.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, Aug. 6, 1812.

SIR: Enclosed is a copy of a letter received by me yesterday, from on board His Majesty's ship Sappho, purporting to have been written by four American seamen on board that ship, with a view to solicit my aid towards effecting their discharge, in consequence of the declaration of war by the Government of the United States against Great Britain.

In making this application, I am fully aware that my duties ceased as agent for the commerce and seamen of the United States, on the knowledge of such declaration being made known here; but, sir, I am led to believe that, at this period, it will not be deemed inadmissible on your part to receive, nor improper on mine to make, the request, that you will be pleased to grant an order for the discharge of these seamen, feeling conscious (should they even not be protected with the usual documents afforded to citizens of the United States) that an English seaman would not declare himself otherwise than such under existing circumstances.

I seize the present opportunity also to forward to you twenty-one documents, as proof of the citizenship of that number of seamen, said to have been impressed by ships of war on this station, the greatest number of which have been heretofore unsuccessfully claimed by me, on behalf of the United States, and which may still comprise, at this time, some part of the crews of His Majesty's ships on this station.

I beg further to state to you, that I have received numerous applications from on board various of His Majesty's ships on this station, for the relief of seamen, who, I doubt not, are entitled to the protection of the American Government, many of them having with them proofs of their citizenship, as I am led to believe from the assertions contained in their communications. Applications have also been made for the relief of many, without success; the latter amount in number to forty-six, as per list of names enclosed, several of whom, I understand have been shifted (since their impressment) on board of other vessels than those they were at first taken on board of. All of which I beg to offer for your consideration, feeling, as I do, anxious to extend my last efforts in behalf of those seamen who are entitled to them, and at the same time being impressed with the idea, that it would be foreign to you, sir, to retain any Americans in the service of the navy of Great Britain, contrary to their disposition, during the present conflict. I, therefore, take the liberty of adding to my former request, that you will be pleased to grant orders that such seamen may be discharged from duty on board His Majesty's ships on this station.

With sentiments of the highest respect, &c.

WILLIAM H. SAVAGE.

Copy of Vice Admiral Stirling's Secretary's letter, in answer to mine to the Vice Admiral of 6th August, 1812.

ADMIRAL'S PENN, Aug. 7, 1812.

SIR: I am desired by Vice Admiral Stirling to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and to acquaint you that directions were given, some days ago, that all seamen in the squadron under his command, who can prove themselves to be American born subjects, should be sent to the prison-ship, until an exchange of prisoners is established between the two countries, in consequence of the late declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain.

I return herewith the papers which accompanied your letter; and am, sir, &c.

Extract of a letter from William H. Savage, Esquire, late Agent for American Seamen and Commerce at Jamaica, to Charles Stirling, Jr., dated KINGSTON, Sept. 16, 1812.

"In answer to my letter of the 6th ultimo, you were pleased to inform me that directions had been given by the Vice Admiral, some days prior to the date of my letter, for the removal of all native Americans (who could prove themselves such) from on board His Majesty's ships to that of the prison-ship; but, as some time has now elapsed since you were pleased to give me this information, and learning that some instances of detention at present exist on board His Majesty's schooner Decouverte, I am led to embrace the subject again, as in one instance I shall hope to satisfy Vice Admiral Stirling of the man's being entitled to his removal from duty on board His Majesty's schooner of war. The person alluded to is Elijah Stirling, an American seaman, who was impressed from on board the British merchant ship Brilliant, at the Bay of Honduras, in the early part of the year 1810; by His Majesty's schooner Flor del Mar, and has since been detained on board of various of His Majesty's ships on this station, although provided with a regular protection, which instrument this man got conveyed to me about the 20th of September following, and which was by me forwarded to Admiral Rowley, accompanied (as usual in like cases) with a request that the man might be discharged. On the receipt of my letter, the Admiral answered, through his Secretary, that the nature of Stirling's impressment was such, that he could not comply with my request; but which answer was unaccompanied, in return, with the protection in question, and what has become of it, I am unable to say.

"About this period, I was led to understand from Admiral Rowley, that all American seamen who should be impressed from on board any British merchant vessel, would be retained in the service of His Majesty; but that all American seamen who should be impressed from on board of American vessels, would, on application, accompanied by proof, be discharged. As this information was received about the period of my application for the discharge of Stirling, I was led to conclude it stamped the nature of his impressment; and what confirmed it in my mind, was, that I received similar assurances to various applications made for American seamen, who had, under various circumstances, shipped on board of British ships, and were from thence impressed on board of His Majesty's ships of war, all of which I hope the Admiral will be pleased to take into consideration: for, to insist on the service of this man, I think will be a dereliction to the marked manner of his amiable endeavors to distinguish and relieve American seamen from duty on board the squadron under his command. I beg to enclose a note from Mr. Meek, (the late Secretary,) relative to my application for this man's discharge, and to observe, that, if it is possible, the protection may yet be found among the papers of the late Secretary, as it has not been usual to return me the protections of those men whose applications for discharge were not complied with.

"I beg furthermore to observe, that there appears also to be on board His Majesty's schooner Decouverte, two other American seamen, viz: John Englefield and Richard Lauderkin, the former of whom asserts, that he served his apprenticeship to the trade of a cooper, at Boston, but has lost his protection; the latter declares himself to be a native of Rhode Island, and that his protection has been destroyed by Mr. Oliver, commander of His Majesty's schooner Decouverte. I shall not now animadvert on the impropriety of such a circumstance, but request, should the instances here cited be found correct, that they may meet the attention of the Vice Admiral.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. H. SAVAGE,
Late Agent, &c.

CHARLES STIRLING, Jr., Esq.

Extract of a letter from Vice Admiral Stirling's Secretary to W. H. Savage, Esq., in answer to his of the 16th September, 1812.

ADMIRAL'S PENN, Sept. 19, 1812.

"I have just received your letter of the 16th instant, which I have laid before Vice Admiral Stirling, and I am directed to acquaint you that Elijah Stirling, and other persons on board of His Majesty's schooner Decouverte, said to be American seamen, have not, when called upon, produced proof of being subjects of the United States. They do not fall under the description of persons which I informed you, in my letter of the 7th ultimo, were intended to be discharged from the King's service, and to be detained on board the prison-ship until an exchange of prisoners takes place with America.

"The note from Mr. Meek, dated the 21st September, 1810, is returned herewith, and as it appears thereby that Admiral Rowley thought the circumstances under which Elijah Stirling was impressed did not permit him to be discharged, Vice Admiral Stirling does not feel himself justified in attending to the man's wishes on a bare assertion. The protection you allude to is not to be found among Admiral Rowley's papers left in this office."

No. 3.

Detention of Mariners as prisoners of war, who were in England at the time the war was declared.

J. W. CROKER to Mr. Beasley.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, Aug. 5, 1812.

SIR: Having communicated to my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty your letter of the 31st ultimo, transmitting a list of men, said to be Americans, who have been impressed and detained on board His Majesty's ships, and requesting their discharge, I have their Lordships' commands to acquaint you, that, under present circumstances, they will defer the consideration of this request. I am, &c.

J. W. CROKER.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Beasley to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, Oct. 23, 1812.

"I have informed you that I had addressed Lord Castlereagh on the subject of our citizens who have been impressed, and are now held in the British naval service. I demanded their release, and complained of the treatment which some had received on offering to give themselves up as prisoners, or refusing to serve when they heard of the war. In reply, I have received a short note from Mr. Cooke, one of the under secretaries, stating that he was instructed to require of me the names of the men who had received the treatment complained of, and the vessels in which they were, which I immediately furnished, and urged a reply to the other part of my letter.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

In an interview I have since had with Mr. Cooke, I took occasion to remind him of it, when he intimated that the Government did not intend to answer me on that point; adding, that England was fighting the battles of the world; we had chosen to go to war, and so aid the great enemy, and that England had as much right to recruit her army and navy, in every possible manner, as France."

Mr. Beasley to Lord Castlereagh.

WIMPOLE STREET, Oct. 12, 1812.

MY LORD: In consequence of the war unhappily existing between the United States and Great Britain, it has become my duty to call your Lordship's attention to the situation of the great number of American seamen who have been impressed; and are now held in the ships of war of His Britannic Majesty. In addition to the wrong which is done to the United States by this detention of their seamen, I regret to state that some of these unfortunate persons, having heard of the war, and offered to give themselves up as prisoners, have, for so doing, or for refusing to do service, been punished.

To put an end to a proceeding and a state of things so revolting to humanity, and so contrary to the law and usage of civilized nations, I persuade myself it is only necessary to present them to the view of the British Government; and I therefore trust that effectual measures will be immediately taken to restore these injured men to liberty and to their country.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

E. Cooke to R. G. Beasley.

FOREIGN OFFICE Oct. 19, 1812.

"In consequence of your letter to Lord Castlereagh of the 12th instant, I am directed by his Lordship to desire that you will furnish me with the names of the American sailors who have been so punished, and of the ship they are on board."

Mr. Beasley to E. Cooke.

WIMPOLE STREET, Oct. 21, 1812.

SIR: Agreeably to the request contained in your letter of the 19th instant, I now transmit to you a list of impressed American seamen on board British ships of war, who, having heard of the war, offered to give themselves up as prisoners, and for so doing, or for refusing to do service have been punished.

I beg you to remind Lord Castlereagh, that the other part of my letter of the 12th instant, requesting the release of the American seamen detained in the British service, is still unanswered.

I am, sir, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

The list referred to in the preceding letter states the cases of the following persons:

John Ballard, on board the Zenobia, offered himself a prisoner, refused, and was put in irons for one night.

John Davis, on board the Thistle, gave himself up as a prisoner, and refused further service, for which he was flogged.

Ephraim Coveil, on board La Hogue, gave himself up as a prisoner, and refused further service, in consequence of which he was kept seven days in irons.

John Hosman, on board La Hogue, gave himself up as a prisoner, and refused further service, was put in irons, still kept therein, and was threatened by the commander with further punishment.

Russell Brainard, on board La Hogue, gave himself up as a prisoner, was put in irons, and still kept therein.

Thomas W. Marshall, Peter Lazette, Edward Whittle Banks, and Levi Younger, on board the Royal William, gave themselves up as prisoners, and were in consequence thereof put into close confinement for eight days.

OCTOBER 12, 1812.

Mr. Beasley requests Lord Castlereagh to cause the necessary passports to be furnished for the American ship William and Eliza, Captain Howland, to proceed to the United States with American citizens.

OCTOBER 21, 1812.

Mr. Cooke acquaints Mr. Beasley that there will be no objection to granting a license to a cartel for carrying to the United States such American citizens (non-combatants) as may wish to return to their country. He requests Mr. Beasley to inform him of the situation of the American ship William and Eliza.

Mr. Beasley to Mr. Cooke.

WIMPOLE STREET, Oct. 23, 1812.

SIR: I have now the honor to repeat to you what I stated in conversation this morning, that the persons for whose return to the United States I requested the necessary passports, are, for the most part, American masters and mariners; that some of them, in consequence of the loss of their vessels abroad, have come here on their way to America; that others of them, having been employed in British ships, are now desirous of returning home; that others, through the detention or condemnation of their vessels under British Orders in Council, and others, through all the casualties to which this class of men is always exposed, are left without the means of conveyance. None of these persons have been, in any way, engaged in hostilities against Great Britain. They are almost wholly destitute, and, for some time, have been chiefly supported at the expense of the United States. There are also, I believe, some American merchants and supercargoes, who are anxious of availing themselves of the same opportunity of returning to their country.

You are, I presume, aware, that the American Government has afforded every facility to the departure of those British subjects in the United

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

States who were under similar circumstances with the persons included in my request.

With regard to the ship William and Eliza, in which these persons are to embark, I beg to observe, that I am well assured by those who have charge of her, that there is no impediment to her departure.

I am, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

Mr. Cooke to Mr. Beasley.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Oct. 28, 1812.

SIR: Having laid before Lord Castlereagh your letter requesting that you may be allowed to send a cartel to America, with citizens of the United States who wish to return to their country, I am directed by his Lordship to express his consent to this proposition, and am to desire you will confer with the commissioners for prisoners of war with regard to the account you are to give for such parts of the crew as shall appear to be combatants, and on that principle must be exchanged.

I am, &c.

E. COOKE.

OCTOBER 29, 1812.

Mr. Beasley states to J. W. Croker, of the Admiralty Office, that Lord Castlereagh had referred him to the commissioners for prisoners of war; that he had accordingly applied to them, and learnt that the instructions which that board had received from the Lords of the Admiralty were not sufficiently explicit to enable them to proceed in the matter. Mr. Beasley requests that their Lordships would be pleased to give such further directions to the Transport Board as might be found necessary.

OCTOBER 30, 1812.

John Barrow, of the Admiralty Office, informs Mr. Beasley, that his letter of the 29th of October had been laid before the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and that the business had been referred to the Transport Board.

OCTOBER 29, 1812.

Mr. Beasley informs Alexander McLeay, of the Transport Office, that he had requested the Lords of the Admiralty would be pleased to give the further instructions necessary; and, presuming that these instructions would be immediately given, requests Mr. McLeay to inform him at what time it will be convenient for the commissioners that he should confer with them on the subject.

OCTOBER 30, 1812.

Alexander McLeay informs Mr. Beasley that he is directed to desire that Mr. B. would transmit to the Transport Office a list of all the persons whom Mr. Beasley proposed to send to America, stating their several qualities, and when and how they respectively came to Great Britain.

NOVEMBER 3, 1812.

Mr. Beasley transmits to Alexander McLeay, of the Transport Office, a list of American citizens whom it is proposed to send to the United States in the ship William and Eliza, stating their several qualities, and when and how they respectively came into Great Britain. This list contains one hundred and ten names. To these are added a list of six persons, being other passengers in the same vessel. Mr. Beasley remarks to Mr. McLeay, "I am well informed that many persons of the description and under the circumstances of those mentioned in the first of these lists, (being seamen,) who were awaiting the result of my late application to Lord Castlereagh for a cartel for their conveyance to America, have, within a few days past, been seized by the impress officers, and taken on board the tender off the Tower; and I beg to know what are the intentions of the British Government respecting them."

NOVEMBER 6, 1812.

Alexander McLeay informs Mr. Beasley that he had received and laid before the commissioners for the transport service, the list of persons proposed to be sent to the United States in the William and Eliza cartel, and adds: "In return, I am directed to request that you will inform the board whether you will engage that the above-mentioned persons, on their arrival in the United States, shall be exchanged for an equivalent number of British subjects, who may have fallen into the hands of the Americans. I am at the same time to acquaint you, that the prisoners above alluded to must sign engagements not to serve against this country or its allies until regularly exchanged."

Mr. Beasley to Mr. McLeay.

NOVEMBER 7, 1812.

I have to inform the board that I am willing to engage that the American citizens whom I propose to send to the United States on board the William and Eliza cartel, shall, on their arrival there, be exchanged for an equivalent number of British subjects of the same description, who may have fallen into the hands of the United States under similar circumstances; and that the men themselves shall sign engagements for the performance of any conditions similar to those which may have been exacted of such British subjects in the United States; it being understood, that, if it be found that British subjects, under any such circumstances, have been suffered freely to depart from the United States, then these engagements, so far as regards the corresponding class of American citizens, shall be void. If, however, it be more satisfactory to the board, that the return or exchange of these men should be regulated by the principles recognised by the two Governments in the cartel which, I am informed, has been lately concluded at Washington, I am ready to enter into an engagement to that effect.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

Mr. McLeay to Mr. Beasley.

NOVEMBER 13, 1812.

I am directed to acquaint you that the prisoners mentioned in the list transmitted by you will be released, upon your entering into an unconditional engagement that they shall be exchanged for British prisoners now in America, or who may be hereafter taken.

Mr. Beasley to Mr. McLeay.

NOVEMBER 16, 1812.

"For those American citizens who composed the crews of ships taken in war, I am at all times ready to enter into any engagement which the law and usage of nations require. But, for those whom your laws have invited, or whom misfortune has thrown into your country—whom accident, and not the fortune of war, has placed within your power, I must still urge my request, that they be allowed to depart the Kingdom on the conditions proposed in my letter of the 7th inst." But, "if the board will enter into an unconditional engagement, that all British subjects who have been permitted to leave the United States since the declaration of war, or who may be permitted to depart therefrom, shall be exchanged for American prisoners of war, I will, in like manner, engage for those American citizens agreeably to your letter." Mr. Beasley adds: "This arrangement, however, I would make with great reluctance; because it would not be in unison with that spirit of liberal warfare entertained by the Government of the United States, and because it would bring within the influence of the war those who might, without detriment to either party, be exempt from its operation."

Mr. Beasley to Mr. Hamilton, of the Foreign Office.

NOVEMBER 23, 1812.

I must beg leave to state, that that part of my note of the 12th ultimo, addressed to Lord Castlereagh, relative to American citizens who have been impressed, and are now held in His Majesty's naval service, remains unanswered. To the reasons already urged for the discharge of those men, may be added that of compelling them to fight against their country; and I need scarcely add, that, as they were forcibly detained before the commencement of hostilities, it would be very unjust to discharge them merely to make them prisoners. Of the number of those unfortunate persons, many must be in vessels on foreign stations at a great distance. It is a subject of much public interest in the United States, and one which involves the domestic comfort and happiness of many families.

Mr. McLeay writes to Mr. Beasley, and, after some preliminary reasoning, says:

NOVEMBER 24, 1812.

The Commissioners (of the Transport Office) are instructed (by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty) to continue to require from you an unconditional receipt, as prisoners of war, for all persons of this description, previous to their being permitted to return to America.

Mr. McLeay to Mr. Beasley.

DECEMBER 23, 1812.

I have received and laid before the Commissioners for the Transport Service, &c., your letter of the 15th instant, and in return am directed to acquaint you that, at present, they are only authorized to deliver up to you the Americans mentioned in the list transmitted by you on the 3d of November.

Mr. Beasley to Alexander McLeay.

DECEMBER 24, 1812.

"After so long a time spent in discussing the principles and conditions of an exchange of prisoners between the United States and Great Britain, I perceive, with some surprise, by your letter of yesterday, that the only persons whom the board are authorized to deliver up to me, are those mentioned in the list transmitted to you on the 3d November, who, though so long known to the board as being at large in this city, have never been detained as prisoners, and who have, ever since their arrival, been maintained at the charge of the United States. During this interval those persons have been partially dispersed; some have been taken up as prisoners, some have been impressed, and some have otherwise disappeared. Others, however, under similar circumstances, have since been added, and there now remain about one hundred persons. Of these men, as I understand the tenor of our correspondence, those who belonged to vessels detained or taken in war, are to be suffered to proceed to the United States on my entering into the engagement which accompanied your letter of the 14th instant; but that, for the others, no engagement is required. In order to avoid any further misunderstanding, I beg to know whether this recapitulation is correct."

Alexander McLeay to R. G. Beasley.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, Dec. 26, 1812.

SIR: I have received and laid before the commissioners for the Transport Service, &c. your letter of the 24th instant, and, in return, I am directed to acquaint you that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government that such of the Americans, named in the list which accompanied your letter of the 3d of last month, as belonged to vessels detained or taken, and as are consequently prisoners of war, shall be suffered to proceed to the United States upon your entering into the engagement which accompanied my letter of the 14th instant; but that, for Americans who were resident or travelling in this country, or resorting hither for commercial purposes, not as mariners, no such engagement will be required.

I am, &c.

ALEXANDER M'LEAY.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

Mr. Beasley to Alexander McLeay.

DECEMBER 28, 1812.

"On referring to that list (which accompanied my letter of the 3d ultimo) you will perceive another class of persons, namely, mariners, who did not belong to vessels detained or taken; and as your omitting to notice these men in your letter might leave room for some doubt respecting them, I lose no time in requesting to be informed on what terms the Board understand that they are to be suffered to return to the United States."

Alexander McLeay to Mr. Beasley.

DECEMBER 29, 1812.

"By a reference to my letter of the 26th instant, you will observe that mariners are expressly excepted from the description of persons who are to be released unconditionally, and consequently it is necessary you should give a receipt for all the mariners named in the list transmitted by you."

Mr. Beasley to Mr. McLeay.

FEBRUARY 17, 1813.

"In your reply, of the 9th instant, communicating the result of inquiries made by order of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, relative to the alleged ill treatment of certain seamen claiming to be Americans, in the British service, in consequence of their having requested to be considered as prisoners of war, as represented in my letter to Lord Castlereagh of the 12th October, I have to observe, that, although the statement of those persons, and that contained in your letter, differ greatly as to the degree of this ill treatment, it does appear that some severity was exercised towards them on that occasion, and without any proper investigation of their claim of American citizenship, which, if established, should have exempted them not only from punishment, but from service. As it may be inferred, however, from your letter, that if proof be produced to support their claim, their request will yet be complied with, I have to inform you, that evidence to that effect was long since transmitted to the Lords of the Admiralty in behalf of several of these persons." [Here follows the names of persons, and a recitation of the proof of citizenship, &c.] Mr. Beasley proceeds, "I cannot avoid expressing my disappointment and regret that no notice has been taken of the request made to Lord Castlereagh in my letter of the 12th of October, for the general release of the American seamen detained in the British service."

Alexander McLeay, to R. G. Beasley.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, Feb. 26, 1813.

SIR: I have received, and laid before the Commissioners for the Transport Service, &c., your letter of the 7th of this month, with its enclosure, relative to the alleged ill treatment of certain seamen, claiming to be Americans, in the British service, in consequence of their having requested to be considered as prisoners of war; and the same having been referred to the Right Honorable the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, I am directed by the Board to transmit to you the enclosed copy of a letter which they have received from their Lordship's secretary, in answer thereto. I am, &c.

13th CON. 2d SESS.—72

ALEXANDER McLEAY.

John Barrow to the Transport Board.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, Feb. 25, 1813.

GENTLEMEN: Having laid before my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty your letter of the 18th instant, enclosing a copy of a letter, together with the documents therein referred to, from Mr. Beasley, the American agent for prisoners of war in this country, on the subject of certain alleged citizens of the United States detained in his Majesty's service, I have it in command to signify their Lordships' directions to you to acquaint Mr. Beasley, that neither now, in war, nor before, during peace, is, or was, the British Government desirous of having American seamen in its service; and that their Lordships will now discharge, as prisoners of war, as they formerly did as neutrals, those persons who can adduce any sufficient proof of their being Americans.

You will further inform Mr. Beasley, that all the cases stated by him have received, or are under accurate examination, and that such persons who may appear to be Americans, will be immediately sent to prison, as many have been already.

I am, &c.

JOHN BARROW.

Alexander McLeay to Mr. Beasley.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, March 6, 1813.

SIR: I am directed by the Commissioners for the Transport Service, &c. to inform you, that, upon the receipt of the printed letters which were transmitted by you to this office, for the purpose of being forwarded to certain seamen on board of His Majesty's ships of war, they considered it their duty to submit the same to the consideration of the Right Honorable the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and to request their Lordships' directions on the subject; and the Board having, this day, received a letter from their Lordships' secretary, of which the enclosed is a copy, I have their directions to acquaint you accordingly, that the letters in question will not be forwarded, and that you cannot be permitted to maintain any correspondence with the seamen on board His Majesty's fleet.

I am, &c.

ALEXANDER McLEAY.

John Barrow to the Transport Board.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, March 5, 1813.

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your letter of the 16th of last month, enclosing a letter addressed by Mr. Beasley to a seaman on board His Majesty's ship Porcupine, and requesting to be informed if letters of a similar description should be forwarded to the persons to whom they are addressed, I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

Admiralty, to signify their direction to you not to forward any such letters, and to acquaint Mr. Beasley that he cannot be permitted to maintain any correspondence with the seamen on board His Majesty's fleet; observing to him, at the same time, that the printed letter in question, contains a statement unfounded in fact, for that, neither since the war with America, nor before, have their Lordships declined to release American seamen, admitted or proved to be such, though they have, and still do refuse to release persons assuming, without any proof or document, that character. I am, &c.

JOHN BARROW.

Copy of a printed circular letter addressed to American seamen in British ships of war.

LONDON, —, 1813.

In answer to your letter of the —, —, I have to inform you, that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty having, in consequence of the war between the United States and Great Britain, declined to release those American citizens who have been impressed, and are held in the British service, there appears to be no other course for you to pursue, than to give yourself up as a prisoner of war, to the commander of the ship in which you are detained.

U. S. Agent for prisoners of war.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Beasley to Alexander McLeay, dated 13th March, 1813.

"In the letter of their Lordships' secretary of the 5th instant, the Board are directed to observe to me, that the printed letter which I addressed to certain American seamen detained in the British navy, 'contains a statement unfounded in fact; for that, neither since the war with America, nor before, have their Lordships declined to release American seamen, admitted or proved to be such.' It is not necessary to my present purpose to enter upon an examination of their Lordships' conduct on this matter, before the war; although my own official observation, in numerous cases, when I held the office of Consul, would authorize me to dispute even that part of their secretary's assertion. But, with reference to their Lordships' conduct since the war, I beg to remind them of their letter of the 5th August, soon after the commencement of the war, in answer to a request made on the 31st July, for the release of certain impressed American seamen, in which their Lordships, going beyond the mere declining to release the men, stated 'that, under the present circumstances, they will defer the consideration of the request for their release;' or, in other words, that they will not, at present, war being commenced, even think on the subject of their release. If further proof be necessary of their Lordships' having, as I stated in my printed letter, declined the release of such seamen in consequence of the war, I will call to their recollection a letter written by their secretary, on the 25th of August, in answer to an application for the release of William Wilson, an impressed American, detained on board the Cordelia, in which they state that this man, being an alien enemy, must continue to serve, or go to prison. Should other corroboration be wanted, it may be found in the long and marked silence of the British Government to my numerous applications, again and again repeated, for the release of these men; seeing that it was not until the 25th of February, nearly seven months after their Lordships had informed me of their having deferred the consideration of the subject, and nearly five months after my formal demand made to Lord Castlereagh, that they directed the Board to inform me of their intention to treat them as prisoners of war. And even this was not done until eight days after my printed letter in question appears to have been on their table. Surely it was in utter forgetfulness of all these circumstances, that their Lordships declared my statement unfounded in fact; for it appears impossible that they can, in the mind of any person, bear a different interpretation from that which I have given them. But how do these facts bear on their Lordships' statement? How, I ask, does their determination, that Wilson, proved and admitted to be an American, must continue to serve or go to prison, support the assertion, that their Lordships have not declined to release American seamen when admitted or proved to be such? But, perhaps, in their Lordships' view, to send them from service and detention in ships of war, to confinement in prisons, is to release them. If so, it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further, and I will content myself with having vindicated the correctness of my own statement."

"I come now to the consideration of their Lordships' purpose, as expressed in their secretary's letter of the 25th ultimo, to treat as prisoners of war the American seamen who have been impressed, and are held in the British service. Taking into view the manner in which these unfortunate persons came into the power of the British Government; that their own rights and inclinations, the rights of their country, the law of nations, and every principle of justice, were violated in the very act by which each of these men was brought within its power, and that this wrong accumulates so long as any of them remain in its power, I do maintain that they are, on every ground, entitled to, and the British Government is bound to grant, their immediate and complete release. It acquired them only as the spoils of unlawful violence; how then can it retain them as the fruits of lawful war? Its right of control over them can only arise from the lawfulness of their detention; but that which was unlawfully taken cannot be rightfully held; and to acknowledge the pretension to such control as their Lordships' purpose implies, would be to legitimatise the act by which they came into their power. The British Government disclaims all right and all intention to take them, and this disavowal is an acknowledgment of its obligation to restore them to the same condition, and to the same freedom, from which they were taken. Upon what ground is it, then, that they are to be treated as prisoners of war? Not many years have elapsed since all Europe resounded with the complaints of Great Britain against France, for retaining, as prisoners of war, certain British subjects, who, having entered the French territories, in time of peace, were found there at the breaking out of the war. But, if that were regarded in England as an outrage, what will be thought of this detention, as prisoners of war, of American seamen, who, having been wrongfully taken on the high seas, and forcibly carried into the British service, in time of peace, are found therein at the breaking out of a war, doing her service, and fighting her battles? The conduct of France was attempted to be justified by certain acts of England, which were alleged to be equally contrary to the law of nations. But what justification, what excuse, can be set up for this conduct of Great Britain towards the impressed American seamen? What infraction of the law of nations, what violence or injustice exercised towards British subjects, or what outrage is this cruel act to retaliate? It cannot be the free and spontaneous permission given by the United States, at the commencement of the war, for every British subject, of every class and description, found within their territories, or in their power, to return to his country, that this imprisonment of American seamen is to requite. And, surely, this cannot be the indemnification which Great Britain offers these unfortunate men for the wrongs which she has inflicted on them, or the reward which she bestows for the service she has received at their hands.

"To the unqualified prohibition of all correspondence between myself and the impressed American seamen in His Britannic Majesty's fleet, so unreservedly stated in the letter of their Lordships' secretary of the 6th instant, I must conform, whatever may be my sentiments and feelings respecting it. The situation in which these unfortunate men and myself stood towards each other, appeared not only to invite, but to authorize a communication between us. On their part, the object of this correspondence was to obtain information and counsel as to the proper manner of conducting themselves under circumstances the most difficult, and on an occasion the most important and solemn, namely, how to act while forcibly held to service in ships of war belonging to a State engaged in actual hostilities against their country—a situation which their own good sense and proper feelings taught them was alike incompatible with their rights and their duties. My part has been, after having waited five months, in vain, for a communication of their Lordships' intentions, to recommend them, since there appeared no means of obtaining their release, to give themselves up as prisoners of war—an evil comparatively light to that which they suffer. In other instances, their letters have related the rejection of their offer, and the threats of punishment, and all contain complaints of the unexampled hardship of their situation."

R. G. BEASLEY.

A. McLEAY, Esq.

Extract of a letter from Robert Montgomery, Consul of the United States at Alicante, dated the 4th of November, 1812, to the Secretary of State.

"Herewith is a copy of a letter to Admiral Hallowell, with his reply. The man in question has declared, under oath, that he never signed any article or agreement whatever to serve on board the Indefatigable, nor any other British vessel, and he has now left her, losing what wages was due him."

ALICANTE, October 23, 1812.

SIR: Philips, a mariner and citizen of the United States, as appears by a regular protection, from the Collector of New York, informs me that, some time since, he engaged himself on board the transport Indefatigable, for six months, at certain wages agreed for; that he has now been eight months in said vessel, and demands his discharge and wages, but the master having refused both, obliges me to request you will inform yourself of the fact, and if as the mariner states, order him to be paid off and discharged.

Permit me to assure you, &c.

BENJAMIN HALLOWELL, Esq.,
Admiral Royal Navy Great Britain.

H. M.'s SHIP MALTA, (Alicante Bay,)

October 26, 1812.

SIR: I find upon inquiry that there is on board the Indefatigable transport, the man mentioned in your letter of the 23d. As there is no objection to a foreigner going in the station of mariner, on board a vessel of that description, and as he has signed articles of agreement to serve on board the Indefatigable, I shall not molest him while he continues in her; but the moment he gets his discharge, I shall deem it my duty to take hold of him, and put him in confinement, as a prisoner of war. I have the honor to be, &c.,

Compulsory service of impressed Americans on board British ships of war.

I, Beekman Verplanck Hoffman, of the town of Poughkeepsie, do certify, that I am a Lieutenant in the United States' Navy; that I was a Lieutenant on board the Constitution frigate in the action and capture of the Guerriere; that after her surrender, I was sent on board; and after taking out the crew, fired and blew up the ship; that eight impressed American seamen were among the crew of the Guerriere, who were liberated at Boston. I was also on board the Constitution, in the action and capture of the Java, and was sent on board that vessel, and after the crew were removed, set her on fire and blew her up. Among the crew of the Java, thirteen impressed American seamen were found, three of whom had entered the British service, and were left, the other ten were liberated as Americans.

Richard Thompson, being sworn, saith, that he is a native of New Paltz, opposite Poughkeepsie ; that he sailed from Wilmington, about the 28th of April, 1810, on board the brig Warren, William Kelly, Captain, for Cork. On the homeward passage, in September following, he was impressed and taken on board the Peacock, a British sloop-of-war, and compelled to do duty. That, while on board that vessel, he made many unsuccessful attempts to write to his friends to inform them of his situation. He further saith, that, after he had heard of the war, himself and two other impressed American seamen, who were on board the Peacock, went aft to the Captain, and claimed to be considered as American prisoners of war, and refused to do duty any longer. They were ordered off the quarter deck, and the Captain called for the master-at-arms, and ordered us to be put in irons ; we were then kept in irons about twenty-four hours, when we were taken out, brought to the gangway, stripped of our clothes, tied and whipped, each one dozen and a half lashes, and put to duty.

He further saith, that he was kept on board the Peacock, and did duty, till the action with the Hornet ; after the Hornet hoisted American colors, he, and the other impressed Americans, again went to the Captain of the Peacock, asked to be sent below, said it was an American ship, and that they did not wish to fight against their country. The Captain ordered us to our quarters ; called Midshipman Stone to do his duty ; and if we did not do our duty, to blow our brains out. "Ay, ay!" was answered by Stone, who then held a pistol at my head, and ordered us to our places. We then continued at our pieces, and were compelled to fight till the Peacock struck ; and we were liberated after an impressment of about two years and eight months.

DUTCHESS COUNTY, ss :

James Tompkins, being sworn, saith, that he is a native of Ulster county, opposite Poughkeepsie ; that he sailed out of New York, in the month of April, 1812, in the ship Minerva, bound to Ireland ; that, on her homeward bound passage, in July after, this deponent, with three other American seamen, Samuel Davis, William Young, and John Brown, were impressed and taken on board the British ship Acteon, David Smith, Captain. We were taken on Saturday evening ; on Monday morning we were brought to the gangway, and informed that we must enter on board the ship and live as other seamen, or we should live on oatmeal and water and receive five dozen lashes. This deponent says, himself and the other three impressed with him, did refuse to enter, and each of them were then whipped five dozen lashes. On Wednesday following, we were again all brought up and had the same offer made to us, to enter, which we refused, and we were again whipped four dozen lashes, each. On Saturday after, the like offer was made to us, and on our refusal we were again whipped three dozen lashes. On Monday following, still refusing to enter, we were again whipped two dozen, each. On Wednesday following, we were again whipped one dozen each, and ordered to be taken below, and put in irons till we did enter ; and the Captain said he would punish the damned Yankee rascals till they did enter. We were then put in irons, and laid in irons three months. During the time of our impressment the ship had an action, and captured a French ship. Before this action we were taken out of irons and asked to fight, but we refused ; and after the action we were again ironed, where we remained till the ship arrived at London. After arriving there we first heard of the war with America, and that the Guerriere was taken. This deponent took his shirt, and Samuel Davis and William Young took their handkerchiefs, made stripes and stars for the American colors, and hung it over a gun, and gave three cheers for the victory. The next morning at six o'clock we were brought up and whipped, two dozen lashes each, for huzzaing for the Yankee flag. Shortly after this, we were all released by the assistance of the American Consul and Captain Hall, who knew us.

This deponent further saith, that all had protections, and showed them, and claimed to be Americans, at the time they were impressed.

JAMES TOMPKINS.

Sworn before me this 17th day of April, 1813 ; at which time the said James Tompkins showed me his wrists, which, at his request, I examined, and there appeared to be marks on both of them, occasioned, as I suppose, from his having been in irons.

MONTREAL PRISON, May 6, 1813.

SIR : I am an unfortunate American, who was taken by the Indians on my way to Malden, with a flag of truce, from General Harrison, on the night of the 31st of January, and after a variety of indignities, too tedious to mention, I was brought here, and put in the dungeon for thirty-three days, and have been up on the centre floor a week. I wish to see you, if possible, and have your advice, &c. In haste, yours, &c.,

SAML. MCKEEHAN,
Surgeon's Mate, 2d Reg. 2d Brig.
Ohio Militia.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

MONTREAL PRISON, May 9, 1813.

SIR: Yesterday Sir George's Aid came and informed me that the nature of my confinement had been contrary to his orders, and Colonel Lethbridge was required to restore me my liberty. I was also informed that you and myself would, probably, in a few days, be sent to the United States. Colonel Lethbridge told me he would send for me at 3 o'clock, and take my parole. In less than one hour, Major Shackleton called, and said the Governor, after a more mature consideration, had concluded he could not let me have my liberty until he would hear from General Proctor.

Two or three days after my imprisonment, Major Shackleton told me that General Proctor had promised, with the next despatches, to send all the papers relating to my case, and that then I would have a hearing.

So you may see punishment by torture is not yet abolished. If they had drove a dagger through my heart, my punishment would have been much less, and their compassion much greater.

Yours, &c.,

SAMUEL MCKEEHAN.

Major Shackleton also told me that Colonel Baynes was unauthorized to tell me what he did.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

MONTREAL JAIL, May 12, 1813.

SIR: I am requested by Doctor McKeehan to inform you of his present unpleasant situation. He is at this time so unwell as to be confined to his bed, and has no chance of getting anything to make him comfortable. No person attends here to examine our situation; neither have we a chance to send out after any necessaries that we want.

I am confident the Doctor's case requires some very speedy aid, particularly as it respects his confined situation, lodging, &c. Yours, respectfully,

GEO. H. RODGERS,

United States' Army.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

Doctor McKeehan's Narrative.

ALBANY, May 24, 1813.

On the 31st of January last I was ordered by General Harrison to proceed to the river Raisin, with a flag of truce, and from thence to Malden, if not stopped by the Indians. We arrived at the foot of the rapids of the Miami, at dark, and not finding a company of rangers as expected, we encamped in a cave, the horse and carryall before the door, and the flag standing by them. About midnight the Indians fired in upon us, killed Mr. Lemont, wounded myself in the foot, and made us prisoners. After despatching Mr. Lemont with the tomahawk, scalping and stripping him, they seized my horse, harness, great coat, blankets, and other clothing, and one hundred dollars in gold, which the General had sent to procure necessaries for the wounded of General Winchester's army.

That night I was made to walk more than twenty miles, to where Captain Elliot was stationed with a party of Indians. The captain treated me politely, and sent me to Colonel Proctor. I was scarcely seated before the Colonel began to exclaim against General Harrison; said he had been used to fight Indians and not British; found fault with my instructions, and said the flag was only a pretext to cover a bad design. I rebutted his insinuations with indignation, which I believe has been the cause of all my troubles since. I was not recognised, in my official character, until the 5th of February, when I was informed by Proctor's aid that I should attend on the wounded with Dr. Bower, and that I would be sent to the United States, but by a different route from that which I came. Doctor Bower in a few days was sent home and I detained.

On the 2d of March, I was arrested, by order of Colonel Proctor, and accused of carrying on a private correspondence. On the 8th, without having any trial, ordered to Montreal, and hurried on from Fort George, night and day, although thinly clothed, and the weather very cold. From Kingston to Prescott, I was made to eat with the officers' servants. This course of torture being finished, on the 28th, when I arrived in Montreal, and without being asked any questions, or suffered to ask any myself, I was put into the dungeon, eight or ten feet below the surface of the ground, where I had neither bed nor bedding, chair, bench, or stool; denied pen, ink, and paper, or even the use of a book, for two weeks. The only current of air that passed through my apartment came through the bowels of the privy! Here I was kept thirty-three days, when I was, to my great joy, put up with the American prisoners, and with them permitted to remain, until last Monday, when I was liberated by the intercession of Lieutenant Dudley, of the navy. Colonel Baynes, aid to the Governor, told me the outrage which had been committed on my person was contrary to his orders.

I left fourteen American prisoners in jail, viz: George H. Rodgers, United States' army; William Hollenback, Onis Hooker, Philaster Jones, Harry Jones, Lewis Minor, Zebina Conkey, Phiney Conkey, Canton; Seth Barnes, Camden; Jared Witheril, John Campbell, Schoharie; Major Watson, Ogdensburg; Alexander McGregor, Balston, who were kept in close confinement, notwithstanding Colonel Lethbridge and Major Shackleton had pledged their words to Captain Conkey, before he left Montreal for Quebec, that they should have the liberty of the town during the day. But the Captain was scarcely gone, when the pledge was either forgotten or disregarded. The prisoners now are not permitted to procure such things as their small stock of money would provide. Sometimes they are half a day without water, and two or three days without wood; and if they complain they are cursed and abused by the jailer, and told they are only allowed a quart of water in the day. I am requested to represent their situation to General

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

Dearborn, which I intend to do as soon as I arrive at Sackett's Harbor.

This is a sketch of the indignities I have had to put up with since the last of January. I am, yours, &c. SAMUEL MCKEEHAN, Surgeon's Mate 2d reg't Ohio Militia.

To his Excellency Major General Dearborn.

NIAGARA COFFEE HOUSE, June 4, 1813.

SIR: Without introduction or apology, I beg leave to state to your Excellency that, on the 31st of January last, I was ordered by General Harrison to proceed to the river Raisin with a flag of truce. I was required, in my instructions, if I met no British officer at that place, to proceed to Malden (if too great danger did not appear from the savages.) The same evening, thirty-three miles from the river Raisin, the Indians fired upon us and killed Mr. Lemont, (one of my attendants,) wounded myself in the foot, then conveyed me to Captain Elliot, who took me to the river Raisin, and from thence sent me to General Proctor, at headquarters, in Sandwich, who swore, by God, that the flag and papers which I gave him, was only a pretence to cover a dishonorable service. I rebutted his insinuations as moderately as my indignant feelings would permit. General Proctor made several observations on General Harrison's ability as a commander; said he was used to fight Indians, but not British troops, &c. He kept my instructions; did not even inform the senior officer, Ensign Baker, of the American prisoners, that he had a letter for him. I was ordered to a tavern, under the charge of a French sergeant. I waited till the 4th of February before I wrote to General Proctor, demanding in what character I was considered; how long I would be detained, and the cause of my detention.

The next day the General's aid informed me I was recognised as surgeon's mate, and would attend with Doctor Bower on the American wounded prisoners. On the 12th I received a letter from General Proctor, in answer to one I had written the day before, of which the following is a copy:

SANDWICH, February 12, 1813.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 11th instant, I am directed by Colonel Proctor, commanding, to observe, that you were sent in for the purpose of attending on the sick and wounded of General Winchester's army, for which purpose you are now detained; and beg leave further to observe, that, in the execution of your duty, you will render a most important service to your country.

I have the honor to be, sir, your humble and most obedient servant,

A. W. McLEAN, A. D. C.

I continued to attend the wounded until the 2d of March, when A. D. C. McLean informed me that I was accused of carrying on a private correspondence, and that he was ordered to take me into custody and secure my papers; which was accordingly done in the most uncivil manner. On the 8th of March, I was taken by a guard to Fort George, without trial or hearing, although I had written to General Proctor repeatedly, requesting an investigation, to which I received no answer of any kind. From Fort George I was sent to Montreal, and hurried on night and day, although thinly clothed (having been robbed and stripped by the Indians) and the weather very cold. On my arrival at Montreal, I was, without being asked any questions, or permitted to ask any myself, put into a dungeon eight or ten feet below the surface of the ground, in dark and solitary confinement, and there kept thirty-three days, after which time I was put up with the American prisoners. A few days after my elevation, Lieutenant Dudley became acquainted with my situation, and made such representations to Governor Prevost as induced his Excellency to send his aid, Colonel Baynes, who said he was directed by the Governor to inform me that the outrage which had been committed on my person was contrary to his orders, and told Colonel Lethbridge to take my parole and liberate me immediately. The Colonel, not having materials for writing at hand, said he would send for me at three o'clock. In less than one hour, the town major came, and informed me that the Governor, on more mature consideration, thought he could not liberate me until he got despatches from General Proctor. On the 17th May, eight or ten days after, I was taken from prison, and, in company with Lieutenant Dudley, sent to the United States. I may here observe, that the apartment in which I was confined did not contain either chair, bench, or stool, or any bedding whatever, for the space of two weeks. Fresh beef was furnished, but no salt. I was denied pen, ink, and paper, and treated uniformly with the utmost contempt by the sergeant, whom I had the honor of seeing once every day for a few minutes. By the request of fourteen American prisoners, now in Montreal jail, whose names are hereunto annexed, I beg leave to state to your Excellency, that they are kept in close confinement, sometimes half a day without water, and frequently two or three days without wood to cook with; and when they complained, the jailer's curses were freely lavished upon them. They have not the privilege of procuring some little necessities, which the benevolence of some humane persons enabled them to do by giving them a little money. Sir George Prevost has told them that their confinement is owing to the bad faith of their own Government, &c.

I would have stated to your Excellency the knowledge I had, through the report of others, of the outrages and cruelties exercised on the American prisoners taken at General Winchester's defeat, but must refer your Excellency to Mr. Ruland, who had a command in the Michigan militia last Summer, and who was, after having been dispossessed of all his property, sent to Fort George with me, who no doubt, had many opportunities of hearing such things triumphantly spoken of among British officers and subjects.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

SAMUEL MCKEEHAN.

Ransom of American prisoners from Indians in the British service.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Woodward to the Secretary of State.

ALBANY, March 22, 1813.

"A few days previous to the 31st of January, 1813, I transmitted some letters addressed to the friends and families of a few of the prisoners whom we had been able to ransom out of the hands of the savages.

"On the 31st of January I addressed you a letter covering similar information for twelve other families."

No. 7.

Pillage and destruction of private property on the Chesapeake Bay, and in the neighboring country.

William Sears, of Talbot county, in Maryland, states, that about the — day of April last, whilst the British squadron, commanded, as he understood, by Admiral Warren, lay about Sharp's island, in the Chesapeake Bay, he being on the island called Poplar island, his place of residence, observed some tenders and barges coming off from the squadron in a direction towards the said island. The relater was then in the act of removing his furniture and other property from the island, and hastened therein from seeing the apparent approach of the enemy; but the said tenders and barges, whilst this relater was crossing to the main with his scows and batteaux laden with his property, and in tow of his two schooners, appeared suddenly to put back to their ships. The relater afterwards, in the afternoon and evening of the same day, made two other trips to the island, and succeeded in getting off all his bacon. On the succeeding day, as this relater thinks it was, he again went on the island and got off forty or fifty barrels of his corn and some other articles, without any interruption from the enemy. The relater having, in his first trip, got off his family and slaves, he now watched the movements of the enemy from his farm on the main. On Sunday morning the — he saw two tenders come to at Poplar island and go ashore in barges, and, after some length of time, he saw them depart from the island. The relater, in the afternoon of the last mentioned day, in company with several of his neighbors, went to see what the enemy had done on the island, and found that they had injured nothing, nor taken anything away except some cider from the cellar. The relater then took off with him as many of his hogs and other articles as he could, and was hurried off by seeing the enemy put off from the squadron with several barges in tow of their tenders. The enemy, on that evening, took possession of the island, and remained that night and a part of the next day, as well as this relater recollects; and, on the last mentioned day, left the island and followed the squadron, which, in the meantime, had moved up the bay. The relater, seeing this, on the next or the second day after, again went on the island, and there found that the enemy had taken and killed about thirty head of black cattle, eighty-six head of old sheep and between twenty and thirty lambs; that they had killed three hundred breeding sows in their beds, whose pigs were found dead; and that they had taken off almost all of his poultry, all he supposes they could catch. From his house (where he had left some of his worst furniture) they took off an old looking glass, worth about four dollars, and some newspapers in a file. They broke several locks and one door, and threw many things about the house. In a house on the island, which had been occupied by James Sears, they broke his desk to pieces and threw about his furniture and other things; but the relater does not now recollect that anything was taken away.

In testimony whereof the said William Sears hath hereunto set his hand, this 22d day of June, 1813.

STATE OF MARYLAND, Cecil County:

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county and State aforesaid, Frisby Henderson, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that, on the 29th day of April, 1813, about seven o'clock A. M., a considerable British force, distributed into thirteen barges, commenced a hostile attack on a landing called Frenchtown, the property of this deponent, in the county aforesaid; that, some days previous thereto, a battery for five guns had been commenced on the wharf, but was in an unfinished state; that, on the approach of the British force, eight or ten men collected, and commenced firing from the battery, and stopped the advance of the barges for some time. The ammunition being expended, the barges then came on, and a firing from them commenced of cannon shot at the battery, and also at the dwelling houses in Frenchtown. The British then landed on the wharf, and immediately set fire to a new store-house on the wharf, which at that time contained nothing but a large quantity of oats, the property of this deponent; and also a fishery adjoining the wharf was set on fire at the same time. After burning the said store-house and fishery, a force of about two hundred and fifty marines was marched from the wharf, through Frenchtown, and up the river shore, to the dwelling-house of this deponent, and demanded the way to the town of Elkton; that, finding the river must be crossed on that direction to get to Elkton, the whole force returned to Frenchtown, broke open the upper store-house, which was at that time full of goods, part of which was the property of the United States, and the remainder for different merchants of Baltimore, to the amount, probably, of fifty or sixty thousand dollars; and plundered and carried off part of the goods, and set fire to the house and burnt it with the remainder of the goods. This deponent saith, that, by the destruction of the two store-houses and fishery, together with the oats and other property he had in the upper store-house, burned by the British as aforesaid, he has sustained a loss of about three thousand dollars.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

STATE OF MARYLAND, Cecil County:

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county aforesaid, Cordelia Penington, living in Frenchtown, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that she saw the British, on the 29th of April, 1813, land on the wharf at Frenchtown, and immediately set fire to and burnt the store-house and fishery. That, on the British breaking open the upper store-house, this deponent went down to the store-house, and solicited the commanding officer not to burn the house; he replied, that he came for the purpose of burning the store-houses; that they were public property; that this deponent replied, the store-houses were private property, and belonged to her brother; the officer said there was public property in it, and should be burnt, and ordered the house set on fire, and burnt it with all the goods they did not carry away.

STATE OF MARYLAND, Cecil County:

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county aforesaid, Delia Penington, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that she saw the British, on the 29th of April, 1813, land on the wharf at Frenchtown, and immediately set fire to and burn down the store-house and fishery. That, after the store-house was on fire, the marines were marched up from the wharf; and, at the time of the plundering and burning the upper store-house, the marines were formed in the road opposite her mother's house. The officer commanding the marines, who informed this deponent his name was Wybourne, said their orders were to burn the stage stable and destroy the stage coaches. That, on this deponent's soliciting of him not to burn the stables and stages, the officer replied, the question they generally asked when they went to any place was, how they voted at the elections, and inquired of this deponent if her uncle, meaning Mr. Henderson, voted for the war.

I do hereby certify, that, on the morning of the 6th of May last, I was impressed at my house at Turner's Creek, by the British forces, as they passed up the river Sassafas to Frederick and George towns, and was forced to accompany them to the above places. On our way up, we were met by two mulatto men in a batteau. Captain Byng, (the name, I believe, of the officer,) in whose boat I was, took a white handkerchief, fastened it on his esponton, and was about to enter the batteau with the negroes, in order to proceed up the river, to inform the officer commanding there that, if he would not fire upon their barges, they would not destroy the town, when he was ordered by the Admiral not to do so, who observed, "that he would only send the negroes with the message; that, as they were known to the people in the fort above, he expected that they would believe what they told them." We were then opposite to Mr. Wicke's farm, which I think must be about a mile below the fort. The batteau with the negroes went to the fort as directed, and the British forces soon after followed. I was in the foremost boat, and continued in said boat until their return down the river, after burning the towns, when I was landed on Mr. Withered's shore; and most positively declare, that there was no white flag ever hoisted in her or any of the other boats, to my knowledge; nor did I ever hear any of the British officers or privates say they had ever hoisted a flag, or that one ever had been fired on.

The captain, on his return down the river, declared, that "if he could catch Colonel Veazey, who commanded at the fort above, he would quarter him, and give me part of his quarter for steaks, for that the fire he had received was one of Washington's rounds."

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

I can't say positively what number of men they lost, as they would only acknowledge five wounded, but think they have sustained greater injury.

Given under my hand, this 9th day of June, 1813.

I certify, that I was at the battery on Pearce's Point, on the 6th of May, when a squadron of British barges visited Georgetown; that I had a full view of all the barges until they got possession of the battery on the Cecil shore, and that I saw no white flag displayed from either of the barges.

JUNE 9, 1813.

We, the undersigned, certify that, on the 6th of May last, at the time Admiral Cockburn, with a considerable armed force, attacked and destroyed Frederick and George towns, on Sassafras river, in the State of Maryland, were in or near the breastwork below Fredericktown, under the command of Colonel Thomas W. Veazey. From our position, we had a full and perfect view of the enemy's hostile armament, and saw nothing with it, or preceded or followed it, that indicated or had the appearance of a flag of truce, according to the established usage of civilized nations.

We understand a flag of truce to be a mission for a pacific purpose, accompanied by men without arms, and unprotected by a naval or military force.

The barges moved up the river in close and compact order; the leading boat, a few yards ahead of the rest, said to be Admiral Cockburn's, carried a colored flag, and was escorted by not less than fifteen armed barges, and full of armed men, immediately in its rear, and evidently approached in a menacing manner, and with hostile intentions.

I do hereby certify, that I was at the breastwork near Fredericktown, on the 6th ultimo, when the British came up the river in their barges, and that I did not see a flag of truce, nor do I believe that the commanding officer at the breastwork knew or supposed there was any such thing in or among the barges. As witness my hand, this 12th day of June, 1813.

The deposition of Richard Barnaby, of Fredericktown, in Cecil county, Maryland, aged about forty-eight years.

Being duly sworn, deposeeth and saith, that, on the morning of the 5th of May, after the engagement took place at the fort below this town, that he went a short distance out of town to see some females to a place of safety, and, on his return, he met about twenty of the British troops armed, commanded by an officer, who observed, on meeting of him, here is one of the damned rascals from the fort; and then inquired where the damned rascals which were at the fort had run to, and ordered him to go with him and show them to him. The deponent observing he did not know where they were, the officer swore he was a liar, and drew his sword, and threatened to kill him; one of the men presented a bayonet, and another drew a dirk, and swore if he did not go he would run it through him. He afterwards went with them as far as Captain Francis B. Chandler's house, at which time Francis B. Chandler was going towards his house; and, on their hearing some person call him captain, the officer ordered his men to take him; the Admiral coming up at the time, inquired the reason that house was set on fire. Afterwards, this deponent returned to his own house with the Admiral, and requested of him not to have it set on fire. The Admiral promised it should not be burnt if he would furnish him with thirty fowls, which he promised he would do. He furnished them with about thirteen fowls. They then took away and destroyed nearly the whole of his furniture which was in the house, and his provisions, and left him

The deposition of Francis B. Chandler, of Fredericktown, Cecil county, Maryland, aged about thirty-nine years.

Being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that, on the morning of the 6th of May last, just as he returned from the fort, he was standing near his house, and saw a British party, consisting of about fifty persons, armed and headed by an officer, said to be a post captain, running up to his house; that he, this deponent, stepped upon the steps of the house, and requested the officer not to enter; that he caught him by the breast, and called him a damned rascal, and pulled him from off the steps, and then entered the house, with the whole of the party, and gave three cheers, and ordered the men to go to work, and called for fire; that they immediately commenced cutting the staircase, window-sash, and breaking the glass, and set the house on fire in three places; that, at this time, Admiral Cockburn arrived, and he, this deponent, begged him to have the fire put out until he would reason the case with him, and the Admiral asked him what he could do; if he could furnish thirty bullocks in half an hour; that if he could not, the house should be burnt; and asked him if he would try to get them; and upon this deponent replying in the affirmative, ordered the fire to be put out for the present; that he, this deponent, got upon his horse, and rode about half a mile, when he fell in with Colonel Veazey, and informed him what he was after; and that the Colonel told him to go back and inform the Admiral that he should not have them; that he returned and informed the Admiral of it, who then asked him what else he could do; and if he had a good deal of poultry; and upon replying yes, told him he must have it, and ordered his men to catch it; which was done, and carried off; that then, by the great persuasion and entreaty of this deponent's wife and sister, the house was ordered not to be burnt; but the sister of this deponent was much abused by one of their inferior officers, for her exertions in endeavoring to save the property; that this deponent had his warehouse burnt by them, with a considerable quantity of goods in it, and that he himself was a prisoner with them for about three hours.

On this 12th day of June, 1813, personally appeared Jonathan Greenwood, aged thirty years, and being first sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did declare, and say: that, on the morning of the 6th of May last, upon the landing of the British forces at Fredericktown, where this deponent resides, an officer and two sailors came to said deponent's house, and swore that, if they had not found him without arms, they would have thrust him through with their bayonets; they then retired, fell in with some other forces, which soon after came to deponent's house, broke it open, took whatever they conveniently could carry away, and destroyed the rest, with their cutlasses and dirks, and burned it, with his dwelling-house, storehouse, and kitchen. The officers appeared to be most active in the destruction of his property. The houses in the town were, soon after, generally, set on fire and destroyed.

The deposition of Captain John Allen, of Fredericktown, Cecil county, Maryland, aged about fifty-one years.

Being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that, on the morning of the 6th May last, when the British forces landed, on the beach of Fredericktown, and marched up through the streets, they fell in with this deponent at his brother James Allen's house. The troops were headed by their commanding officer, (Admiral Cockburn, as this deponent was informed by one of the men,) and observed, who the damnation are these that kept such a firing upon us—are they regulars? This deponent answered no, they were militia; he then asked where they were gone, and was told he did not know; he then asked, where are all the men of the town? and was informed they were moved out; he said he had sent word to the shore that, if he was not fired upon, he would not destroy any property, and turned round and observed, to a black boy standing by, you black son-of-a-bitch was one of the persons I sent word by; which the boy denied. He then ordered the men to go on and burn and destroy, which they executed with fidelity. This deponent then begged the Admiral to spare his house, (meaning the house of James Allen,) as his brother's wife was confined up stairs, in a very delicate situation, with an infant only two days old. He then ordered her to be cleared out; Mrs. McDonnah, his wife's mother, run out, clasping her hands, and begged for God's sake to spare her child, for if she was removed her life would be lost. He then ordered, spare this house. He now marched off after the men that had been gone for some little time, and shortly after returned on horseback. This deponent then requested the Admiral to spare him one house, that he might collect his family together in, after it should please Providence to restore peace between the two nations. He then directed this deponent to get him some fowls, who informed him he had none; he damned him, and asked if he could not get them, and was told no; immediately afterwards a fire was made in the storehouse, and consumed. While George and Frederick towns were in flames, the Admiral, in the presence of this deponent, observed to his officers, well, my lads, this looks well; to which no reply was made, and he ordered all hands on board of the boats. That this deponent saw the British, two-and-a-half miles off, coming up, and saw no flag of truce, or anything like it. That this deponent was of opinion the defence made by Colonel Veazey, and the men under his command, was such as to entitle them to much credit, and justified by every circumstance within his knowledge; though himself and brother are sufferers to nearly one-half of the property in Fredericktown. JOHN ALLEN.

The deposition of Joshua Ward, living about one mile from Fredericktown, in Cecil county, aged forty-four.

Being duly sworn, deposeth and saith, that, from the best information he could obtain, from those persons that were left at his house, that a party of British, consisting of between thirty and forty men, commanded by an officer, said to be a post captain, on the 6th of May last, went to his house, and immediately placed a guard around it, inquired particularly for him, and searched every part of the house, swearing they would sacrifice him; being disappointed in finding me, they then began to destroy the tables, chairs, looking glasses, &c.; when they had completed the destruction of such furniture as they could not take off with them, the officer himself took down a pair of handsome looking glasses, and others of the party took as much of the best bedding, clothing, plate, window curtains, &c., as they could conveniently carry with them; my little boy's clothes they carried off on the point of their bayonets; before they left the house, they put powder in every room below stairs, an officer got fire himself from the kitchen, and had it kindled in the different rooms, and a bed put in the cellar with a part of the broken chairs, tables, &c., and a fire kindled; they then left the house, but continued in the yard until the fire was bursting from the windows, and swore, that, if there was an attempt to extinguish the fire, they would put the person to death; that they intended to return and burn everything on the farm; they fired at one of my sons, not twelve years of age, as he was driving off a flock of sheep.

The deposition of Toilus Robertson, aged about thirty-four years, who did live within about one mile of Fredericktown, Cecil county, Maryland.

This deponent states, that, on the morning of the 6th of May, he was at the breastwork near Fredericktown, at the time the British armament came up the Sassafra river; that he saw no flag of truce; that, after the militia were obliged to retreat, he returned home, and in a very short time saw a party of the British coming towards his house, and he and his family left their house, except two black women and a black man, who state that the British took the deponent's household furniture, and piled it up in the yard before the house door, and set them on fire, which communicated to the house, and consumed it also;

the barn, which stood about one hundred yards from the house, was set on fire and consumed. This deponent lost all his household goods and provisions. He saw Fredericktown in flames, previous to his leaving his house, which alarmed himself and family to that degree, that he abandoned his house for their safety.

The deposition of Moses N. Cannon, aged about thirty-two, who lives within about one-half mile of Fredericktown, in Cecil county, Maryland.

This deponent states that he was at the breastwork, near Fredericktown, on the 6th of May last, when the British armament came up the Sassafra river; that he saw no flag of truce; that, after the militia were obliged to retreat, he returned home, and was occupied in turning horses out of his wheat field, when a party of the British came to his house; he rode up to them, and they informed him that he was their prisoner; and on his observing that he was in their power, they inquired of him if he had anything to drink, and he answering in the negative, they told him they had got something to eat, and asked him if he wanted his house burnt; and he answering in the negative, they told him to go then to the captain, that he was in the house, and would set fire to it; and on his going towards the house he met the person whom they called the captain, with another person with him, loaded with his, this deponent's, bed clothes, a pair of boots, and a number of other articles, carrying them towards his men, who were formed outside the yard; at the time, an officer on horseback rode up and inquired of the deponent where the damned militia were; observed to him that they had retreated, pointing at the same time towards a wood; he observed he must burn the deponent's house, and on the deponent expostulating with him, and stating the disadvantage he would labor under, in case his house was burnt, he then inquired of him the road to the mouth of Elk river, and if he, the officer, could march his men there, and the deponent observed that his Government would not permit him to give him any instruction; and the officer observed that he knew that as well as the deponent, but that he might trust a British officer, and smiled, and turned his horse, and ordered his men to march, and they went off, without burning the house or asking any more questions. The deponent then went to a neighboring house to see about a part of his family, and on his return back towards his house, he was fired on by a party of the British, stationed in the public road, about one hundred and fifty yards from the deponent's house; he then retreated across the field, and abandoned his house; he saw, after riding from the party who fired on him, a party going towards his house, who, as he SASSAFRAS NECK, Cecil Co., June 28, 1813.

I do hereby certify, that, being in the fort at Fredericktown, on SassafRAS river, on the morning of the 6th of May last, when a battle took place with the British and the militia, under the command of Colonel Thomas W. Veazey, I distinctly saw the enemy, from the time they first came in view, and discerned no flag of truce, or anything resembling one. The enemy, after some resistance, landed, burned Frederick and George towns, and destroyed a great deal of other private property. My house, about eight miles on the river from the fort, was plundered by them on their way down the river.

JULY 28, 1813.

EASTERN SHORE, (MD.,)

MARENGO, July 18, 1813.

SIR: Multiplied engagements and forgetfulness, succeeding each other, have prevented my forwarding to you this statement of the depredations committed on my property at Sharp's Island, by the enemy, while in the Chesapeake. On the 12th of April, while I was in the act of removing my stock, &c., they landed upwards of a hundred men, and prevented my removing anything. They detained me on the island until the 17th, in which time they were principally engaged in getting water. Declarations were made by Admiral Warren and the other officers, that everything of the stock or grain kind taken away, should be paid for at a fair price. Admiral Cockburn was, as I am informed, at this time sent up the bay with the advance detachment of the fleet. Admiral Warren's ship and a few tenders only remained about the island. At that time they took twenty-eight hogs, four sheep, twelve cattle, thirteen bushels of Indian corn, and informed me that they should allow the following prices for them: Hogs $2½, sheep $2½, cattle $13 a piece, corn $1 per bushel. On my return to the island some weeks afterwards, the accounts were made out to the amount of $247, bills on their Government for the amount, except about $54 in specie. Before I returned to the island the fleet had all gone down the bay. I understood from the inhabitants, living in sight of the island, that the enemy had paid the island another visit, and had made a general sweep of the stock. On my arrival at the island I found it too true. They had taken all my sheep, in number 91; sixty-five of which were one-half and three-fourths blood merinoes, and one full blood ram which cost me $95, eighteen head of cattle, and about twenty hogs. They left a bill on their Government for $133, and cash to the amount of $40. They took all poultry, shot in a wanton manner one of the finest boars which this country could produce, and which was much admired by Admiral Warren for his uncommon beauty and breed, and who forbid, as a favor to me, that he should be disturbed. They bayoneted others, which they left wounded, and which would have been lost had my overseer not saved a part by killing them. They left nothing for the sheep, only a promise of $2 per head. I have estimated my loss, arising principally from this last visit, at $1,203, as will appear by the following statement:

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

18 cattle, at $13	- - - -	$234 00
20 hogs, at $4	- - - -	80 00
55 ¼ and ½ blood lambs, at $10	- - - -	550 00
36 common stock, with fleece, at $6	- - - -	216 00
4 taken at the first visit, merinoes, at $10	- - - -	40 00
		$1,120 00
Deduct $2½ paid for the first four	- - - -	10 00
		1,110 00
1 full blooded merino ram	- - - -	95 00
		<hr/>
		1,205 00
Bills and cash left	- - - -	173 00
		1,032 00
Trouble and expense of reinstating stock	- - - -	100 00
		$1,132 00

I will give those prices to any person who will reinstate the same number of stock and kine at the close of the war, or deliver them at any of my farms, the ram excepted, as I have raised others of the same kind. The injury done me by breaking up the flock of sheep is far beyond the prices stated, as they cannot be reinstated for several years. The destruction of the ram was a wanton outrage, as he was not fit to be eaten. He was bayoneted, and I believe left on the island. This, I presume, was aimed at our manufactures.

There will be a loss of at least 20 per cent. upon the bills if sold here, and probably a total loss if I wait for the British Government to pay them. Add this to the amount above given, makes the total loss $1,203. Your friend and servant,

JACOB GIBSON.

WM. HARRISON, Jr.

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE ADAMS,

July 24, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose the copy of a letter from Lieutenant Reed, giving the particulars of the loss of the schooner Asp, and the inhuman conduct of the enemy to her commander, Mr. Segourney. Another letter from Lieutenant Reed, of the same date, mentions, that no part of the enemy's force were then above Blackstone's Island. He further states, that, in their attempts to land on the Virginia shore, they have been invariably repulsed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
C. MORRIS.

Hon. WILLIAM JONES,
Sec'y of the Navy, Washington.

UNITED STATES' CUTTER SCORPION, POTOMAC, July 23, 1813.

SIR: It is with much pain I have to inform you of the death of poor Segourney, who was killed a few days ago, (I cannot say when,) gallantly defending his vessel. He was attacked whilst lying in Kinsale creek, by three launches, and after a gallant contest beat them off. They, however, on gaining the mouth of the creek, were reinforced by two more, and again renewed the conflict. About this time Mr. Segourney got wounded through the body. The crew, on seeing him fall, having no officer capable of leading them, jumped overboard and gained the shore; when the enemy, who by this time succeeded in getting on board, finding the colors still flying and Segourney sitting up, barbarously knocked his brains out with the butt end of a musket.

At the commencement of the action Mr. Segourney, thinking them too strong for him, had ran the schooner on shore, in which situation the enemy found her, and, not being able to get her off, set her on fire. The militia, however, (who must have been slow in collecting,) by this time got down and beat them off, retook the schooner, and extinguished the flames. They have since buried Mr. Segourney with the honors of war. I have not heard anything of the crew.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.

GEO. C. REED.

Captain CHAS. MORRIS,
United States' Frigate Adams.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

Extract of a letter from Midshipman H. M. McClintock, dated Kinsale, July 19th, 1813, to the Secretary of the Navy Department.

"We were attacked by five boats; we continued doing the same as before, but having so few men we were unable to repel the enemy; when they boarded us they refused giving any quarter; there were upwards of fifty men on our decks, which compelled us to leave the vessel, as the enemy had possession; they set her on fire and retreated."

Extract of a letter from John Tuberville, Major of the 2d brigade, 111th regiment of the Virginia militia, dated KINSALE, July 20, 1813.

"I arrived myself at the place of capture before the colors were lowered, and am confident that, even at that time, their numbers, amounting to between sixty and seventy, might have been reduced one-half before they could make their escape, could I have commanded twenty determined men. The gallant commandant fell before the enemy boarded him, by a ball which passed through his body, but continued to fight to the last extremity. When there were forty or fifty of the enemy on deck, one of the schooner's crew asked for quarter, which was denied him. At this instant the few remaining men made their escape by swimming to the shore, and Mr. Segourney was instantly shot through the head. The vessel was shortly set on fire, and the barges moved off. The officers fought bravely, and Mr. McClintock defended the vessel with much credit to himself, after the commanding officer was wounded."

HON. WILLIAM JONES,
Sec'y of the Navy, Washington.

NEWBERN, July 19, 1813.

SIR: On Sunday night, the 11th instant, an English fleet, consisting of one seventy-four, three frigates, one brig, and three schooners, anchored about one mile from Ocracock bar; about day-break we were informed of it at Portsmouth, by persons from Ocracock. I immediately got up and ordered the cutter to get underweigh, and run up to Newbern and give the alarm, which she did, but made a very narrow escape from the barges, as she was obliged to beat over the swash against wind and tide, while they could row a straight course. I believe Admiral Cockburn had intended to have visited Newbern for the purpose of robbing the banks, but was prevented by the cutter making her escape to give the alarm. Indeed he said such was his intention, and was very much exasperated because the barges did not take her. I believe there were as many as twenty-five barges that crossed the bar, and I think there could not have been less than three thousand regulars, marines, and sailors in them: they captured the privateer brig Anaconda, of New York, and the letter of marque schooner Atlas, of Philadelphia, both valuable fast-sailing vessels; they then landed on Portsmouth and Ocracock, and such a cruel wanton destruction of property was scarcely ever witnessed; they broke in pieces almost every species of furniture, cut open beds, and scattered the feathers, and even carried their villany to such a length as to rob many women of their children's clothes, without leaving them a second suit to their backs. The officers pretended there should be no depredations committed; and when complaints were made to them they would say, "point out the fellow and he shall be corrected," well knowing that it would be impossible to identify any one of them among such a number of strangers. They took off of the two places two hundred cattle, four hundred sheep, and sixteen hundred fowls, for which they pretended to pay the inhabitants, some of whom I believe received more than compensation, and others received nothing: in short, they have ruined almost all on the places. I had time to send my trunk, with what bonds and money there are belonging to the United States, on board the cutter, which escaped; I also had time to bring a few of the most valuable papers belonging to the office; it is well I did, for they destroyed my office entirely, every paper in it, both public and private; they destroyed my library and all other property of mine they could find, about eight hundred dollars' worth, and then sent me on board the seventy-four, where they detained me two days, until they had embarked and ready for sail. I was on shore two days before they discovered I was a public officer; I presume they sent me on board to prevent observation. After they had kept me until they were ready to start, they turned me adrift in the ocean in a small boat with four Spaniards, not one of whom was acquainted with the bar more than myself, in consequence of which we got into the breakers, and very narrowly escaped being all lost. All these things were transacted under the directions of the humane Admiral Cockburn. I believe, from the conversation I overheard, that they intend to visit Beaufort, then Wilmington, and so on to the southward.

My returns will be made as soon as I can get what remain in some kind of order.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
THOS. S. SINGLETON,
HON. WILLIAM JONES, Collector.
Act'g Sec'y of the Treasury.

On the morning of the 3d May, the day the British, under the command of Admiral Cockburn made the attack on the town of Havre-de-Grace, on my return from the commons where I had deposited some ammunition, I observed an officer on the horse of Mr. James Wood of this place, a few paces in a Southwest direction of the church. At first sight I was of the opinion it was one of our own officers, which I thought to be Adjutant McKinna, having heard but a few moments before the voice of John O'Neill crying out in words to this effect: "damn it men, return; we can certainly beat the rascals off." I was, however, deceived, as this officer was the person who took O'Neill prisoner while in the act of entreating the militia to return. Not knowing at the time that O'Neill was taken by him, I advanced in a direction towards the church on my way to the magazine, to assist in carrying off more ammunition, when I discovered in the front of the church a file of marines. To the best of my recollection I was then at a distance of from 100 to 150 yards from the officer on horseback, and I think about the same from three militia men, when this officer (said to be Lieutenant Westfall) with a drawn sword in his hand, it being the only flag he carried, cried out two or three times—"will you surrender?" One of the militia men made answer, but what it was I could not distinctly hear, and immediately fired on him, and it is said wounded him in the hand. Finding it impossible to reach the magazine, the marines being then round the church, which was contiguous to it, I bent my course towards Mrs. Sears's tavern, in hopes of finding some of the British officers there, and by entreaty to save some of the private property, which I was fearful would be destroyed. On reaching Mrs. Sears's sign post, I found the first division of boats had just reached the wharf, and two large guns were fired, one of which threw a ball on the roof and knocked off some shingles; the firing then ceased, and two other gentlemen with myself advanced on the wharf and asked for the commander of that division of boats. A person, whom I supposed to be a midshipman from his appearance, answered, "Captain Lawrance will be here directly;" he then asked a number of questions, such as, "have you any newspapers? how many militia have you, and where are they stationed? where is your post-office?" &c., to all of which we carefully avoided giving any direct answer. Some of the barges then warped up alongside of the wharf, when I thought it most prudent to leave them, being fearful that I should be made a prisoner. I then walked up towards the ferry-house, followed by the two gentlemen who went with me on the wharf; we were met by an officer, who immediately ordered us back. After reaching the lower end of the wharf, the midshipman before mentioned said, "sir, this is Captain Lawrance," pointing to the officer; Lawrance then addressed us in words to this amount: "what have you got to say for yourselves; where is your mayor or chief magistrate?" He was told we had no mayor, and that there was no magistrate in the place. He then asked, "are you prepared to ransom the town?" I asked him what sum he demanded; he said about $20,000. We told him no such sum could be raised. "Why, then," he replied, "did you fire on us? had you not done that, and hung out a flag, we would have treated you better." I then asked him what was their intention in coming, and in what manner they would have acted had a flag been hung out on their approach? To the first question he gave no answer, but after a short pause observed, "about one-half the sum now demanded would have been taken." He was then told, small as that might appear to him, it could not have been raised. "Then," says he, turning hastily round, "in three-quarters of an hour your town shall be in flames; you shall now feel the effects of war." The said Captain Lawrance then went into the tavern of Mrs. Sears, and with two or three men brought out a bale or box of goods, (which was said to have been lodged there the night before, belonging to a lady in Georgetown,) and placed it a few paces in front of the house; another officer (name unknown) entered afterwards, and brought out a second box, and placed it near the first. Captain Lawrance then turned to him and said "sir, I have placed a guard here; we must now attend to other business; we will see to this (pointing to the goods) to-night." The order to fire the house was then given, and Captain Lawrance walked down street and entered the store of S. Hogg & Co., the door of which had been previously broken open, and a few men were in the act of taking off wearing apparel, &c.; others had got to the counting-room desk in search of money, scattering the papers, &c., on the floor. The shameful act of pilfering the goods was, however, reserved for the redoubtable Captain Lawrance; he it was who first began the shameful scene, so disgraceful to an officer, by taking down knives, forks, &c., saying, "ha! the very thing we want;" and, turning round, called in a fresh set of plunderers, and said, "boys, here is fine plunder:" the men did not wait a second invitation, but set in with their worthy leader, and in a short time emptied the store, excepting some articles which were of little value.

WM. T. KILLPATRICK.

P. S. When I found that Captain Lawrance ordered his men in the store, and gave the order to plunder, I remonstrated with him on the impropriety of such proceeding, and observed, that, with civilized nations at war, private property had always been respected. He replied, in a hasty manner, "you ought to be more particular in your choice of representatives; you wanted war, and you shall now feel the effects."

Personally came James Wood, of Havre de Grace, before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for Harford country, and made oath, according to law, that, on Monday morning, the 3d of May, 1813, between daylight and sunrise, as he was riding in the town of Havre de Grace, he discovered some men in the act of hauling up the shore a piece of artillery that had been mounted on the battery, and from their dress and the dulness of the morning he took them to be Americans, nor did he discover his mistake until he was taken prisoner and compelled to dismount; upon which the officer commanding the British immediately mounted his horse. A short period after, he was ordered on board of a barge in company with some other prisoners, which barge was moved up to Mrs. Sears's wharf, in company with other barges. Some short time after, he discovered a house at some distance from the water to be on fire, which excited some surprise, (the house belonged to Mr. John Tucker.) He observed to the coxswain of the boat, there was a house on fire, and asked him if he did not suppose it to be set on fire by a rocket; he replied, "perhaps it might." Directly after, I saw the British kindling a fire in the yard of Mrs. Sears, and asked them for what that was intended. The coxswain answered, "to set that house on fire." I then asked them, "why, you are not going to burn the building?" The reply from an officer on board the same barge (and who, I believe, had not been on shore) was, "yes, sir, we shall lay your town in ashes;" and in a few minutes I saw a general conflagration of the greater part of the best buildings, during the time I remained on board, which was until a very short time before they left the place. I saw the officers as well as the men in small squads bringing on board the barges, as they lay at the wharf, plundered property of almost every description, and depositing it. During the time, an officer brought on board a large trunk or box, and calling to one of the men, said, "I will give you two dollars to take care of this for me; this is my own plunder; this was a stage passenger's property, and therefore is mine." He further declares that he has no knowledge of any flag of truce being held out by the British, nor does he believe there was any.

Personally came Roxana Moore, before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of Harford county, State of Maryland, and made oath, according to law, that on Monday morning, the 3d of May, in consequence of the firing of the British into the town of Havre de Grace, I fled for safety (my husband being from home) into the cellar of the house in which I lived; that, upon the firing having stopped, I came up, and meeting an officer on horseback, and who was wounded in the hand, I applied to him for protection, fearing injury from some of the men. He replied, "I will not hurt you, nor shall my men, but I will burn your house." I answered him that I could not get out of it with my little children. He replied, "then I will burn your house with you and your children in it." They proceeded a little further, and, after having set fire to my neighbor Richard Mansfield's tavern house, a number of them returned and entered my house, and began to pillage and plunder. They took the whole of my bed clothes, my own clothes, and all my children's even to my youngest child's, a baby not two months old, together with my cradle furniture. Upon my soliciting them to spare me some few things, one replied, "I will take every everything I can, it's what we came for," and immediately seized a shawl from around my neck, and which was at that time nearly all the covering my little baby, whom I held in my arms, had, and carried it away; they more than once put fire to the house, but from the exertions of some of my neighbors it was as often put out.

She further declares that she never saw any flag of truce held out by the British, nor doth she believe there was any.

Personally came Richard Mansfield, a citizen of Havre de Grace, before the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for Harford county, Maryland, and made oath according to law, that on Monday morning, the 3d of May, 1813, being in his own house about sunrise, and viewing the British barges as they came up the river, they keeping up a continual firing into the town, until they reached Mrs. Sears's wharf, being about two hundred yards below this deponent's when the firing ceased; they then landed, and, as well as he could discover at the distance from which he stood, immediately launched a 24 pounder on board a ferry boat, which bilged her, as she began to settle in the water as soon as they moved her out, and in a few minutes went down; during this time, two of the barges kept moving slowly up towards this deponent's, and as soon as landed, a petty officer ran to this deponent's ferry boat and called out, "there is nothing in her;" "cast her off," was the reply, which was instantly done. This deponent and his son being at this time on the wharf, discovered a British officer on horseback with several of his men at his heels, making to his house, upon which he returned and met them a few yards in front of his house. This officer, (whose name this deponent since learned was Lieutenant Westfall, and who was wounded through the hand) immediately ordered the house to be set on fire. This deponent remonstrated against such procedure, urging its being unprecedented among civilized nations at war, to burn and destroy private property; that when nations were at war all public property became fair objects of destruction, but that private property had heretofore been respected, except such as might unfortunately be injured by the usual and customary mode of warfare, or that might be taken as provisions. His reply was, "by G—d it should be burnt." This deponent and a Mr. King, who came with the officer, solicited for the moveable property that was in the house, it being furniture, stating to him that that was this deponent's only dependence, and was all he had. He replied generally, by ordering his men to burn. During this conversation the men were in the house breaking and destroying everything before them. Mr. King then begged the officer for one hour, saying that whatever could not be saved in that time might go. The officer's reply was, "one hour, no, by G—d, not five minutes; burn that house." Immediately they commenced, and had the dwelling house on fire in four different places in a few minutes. This deponent, together with Mr. King, continued to solicit for permission to save some furniture: after some time, Lieutenant Westfall observed, "you may save what you can, and what you can save shall not be disturbed." Exertions were then made by this deponent, his son, and Mr. King, to save from the devouring flames, which proved successful for a short time; but a few minutes convinced us what little dependence was to be placed on the word of a British officer, as the men, aided by officers, carried off what had been, by great exertions and considerable risk, saved from the flames. The enemy had been busily employed breaking, destroying, and carrying away, until the flames got to such height as to render it unsafe to go within the walls. They then commenced upon such property as this deponent had saved, carrying off every portable article, until their barges were stowed; ripping up beds, throwing the feathers to the air, cutting up chairs, breaking open desks, &c. The officer who made the attack on a walnut desk, refused to have it unlocked, but, after breaking open the lid, discovered the inner door, exultingly exclaimed, "ah! I am used to such things," or, "I am acquainted with opening desks," or some expression to that amount, and immediately broke it open, and continued his search as if for money. After having destroyed and carried off nearly the whole of this deponent's property, and seeing the buildings burnt down, they moved down to Mrs. Sears's wharf, and joined the other barges. This deponent was then advised by some of his friends to apply to some of the officers and endeavor to get some of his property back, which he did, but found such obstacles in the way that, after getting a looking glass, and some two or three articles of small value, he gave it up; but meeting the Admiral in person, he renewed his application, and after some time, was directed to go on board and get what he could; this deponent then stated the impossibility of succeeding without an officer to accompany him. An officer was sent, but after repeated attempts to get some of his property, he was, from the abuse and threats of being run through with a sword from an officer of marines, for claiming his property, compelled to decline any further exertions, after getting another looking glass, and a few more very trifling articles.

This deponent's observations being confined to his own house, and its immediate neighborhood, which was at the upper end of the village, he was not an eye-witness to their savage-like conduct generally. One dwelling-house and grocery store, the property of Mr. George Bartoll, which stood a few rods below, and in front of this deponent's, he saw the enemy plundering, and breaking everything to pieces, and ending by setting it on fire and burning it down; a number of houses were set on fire that were not consumed; a number they only robbed and broke the doors and windows; among the latter was the church, in which not one solitary window was left whole. During the time this deponent was on Mrs. Sears's wharf, and on board the barges, he solicited for the prisoners, citizens of the town, to be set at liberty, naming those that he immediately saw and knew, among whom was James Sears, a youth of about seventeen, and John O'Neal, a naturalized Irishman, both of whom were, in a most positive manner, refused; and, as soon as O'Neal's name was mentioned, the officer, to whom the application was made, replied, "No!"—swearing he would have O'Neal hung if he could. O'Neal has since been discharged on parole. This deponent declares that he has no knowledge of any flag of truce being sent by the British, nor does he believe there was any.

Massacre and burning of American prisoners surrendered to officers of Great Britain, by Indians in the British service—Abandonment of the remains of Americans killed in battle, or murdered after the surrender to the British—The pillage and shooting of American citizens, and the burning of their houses after surrender to the British, under the guarantee of protection.

Extract of a letter from Augustus B. Woodward, Esquire, to General Proctor.

DETROIT, Feb. 2, 1813.

"They [the inhabitants of Michigan] have entertained a constant apprehension that, when the American forces approach the Territory, and when an engagement has taken place, the fury of the savage mind at the sight of blood, and in reflecting on the dead they lose, and, perhaps, on the retaliatory treatment of prisoners, or of the dead, which their cruel mode of warfare is always likely to produce, might drive them to an ignoble revenge on the prisoners they find in the country, and the inhabitants of it, who are American citizens. They, therefore, pressed the subject on your attention previous to the battle of the 22d of January, 1813; and felt satisfied with your assurance that you considered your own honor pledged for their effectual protection.

"Since the result of that battle, facts are before their faces which they cannot shut their eyes upon. Some of them are, perhaps, unknown to yourself. I will enumerate some which I believe there will be no difficulty in establishing beyond the reach of contradiction.

"First. Some of the prisoners, after the capitulation of the 22d of January, 1813, have been tomahawked by the savages.

"Second. Some of the prisoners, after that capitulation, have been shot by the savages.

"Third. Some of the prisoners, after that capitulation, have been burnt by the savages.

"Fourth. Some of the inhabitants of the Territory of Michigan, citizens of the United States of America, after the capitulation, have been shot by the savages.

"Fifth. The houses of some of the inhabitants of the Territory, American citizens, after the capitulation, have been burnt by the savages.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

"Sixth. Some of the inhabitants, American citizens, after the capitulation, have been pillaged by the savages."

A. W. McLean, Esq., to Mr. Woodward.

SANDWICH, Feb. 9, 1813.

SIR: You will have the goodness to appoint a day for the purpose of adducing, before Colonel Proctor, such proofs as you may have, to substantiate the assertions in your letter to him, relative to the slaughter of the enemy's sick and wounded, on the 22d of January last.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. W. McLEAN, Aid-de-camp.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Woodward to General Proctor.

SANDWICH, February 10, 1813.

"I had the honor to receive, on the third day of this month, a verbal message from you, communicated to me by Major Muir, requesting me to procure some evidence of the massacre of the American prisoners on the 23d day of January last.

"I met with only a few persons at Detroit who are inhabitants of the river Raisin, nor was it altogether a pleasant task to those to relate, in these times, the scenes they have beheld. Some of them, however, appeared before a magistrate, and I send you copies of what they have stated. It will occur to you, sir, immediately, that what any of them state on the information of others, though not direct evidence in itself, leads to the source where it may be obtained.

"In communicating your message, Major Muir added something having relation to American citizens who might be willing to take the oath to the King.

"It will be obvious to you, sir, that, in a state of open and declared war, a subject or citizen of one party cannot transfer his allegiance to the other party without incurring the penalties of treason; and while nothing can excuse his guilt, so neither are those innocent who lay temptation before him.

"The principles adopted by the United States on the subject of expatriation are liberal, but are perfectly inapplicable to a public enemy in time of war.

"Some of the French inhabitants of the Territory of Michigan, citizens of the United States of America, have been much urged on this subject, and are apprehensive of being still further troubled.

"I had the further honor of receiving, on the 8th instant, your verbal message, by your aid-de-camp, Mr. McLean, acquainting me that there was no capitulation on the 22d of January, and that the prisoners surrendered at discretion.

"I, therefore, beg pardon for that mistake.

"The principles, however, of the law of nations, impose an obligation almost equally strong."

TERRITORY OF MICHIGAN,
District of Detroit, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, one of the justices of the peace in the district of Detroit, Joseph Robert, an inhabitant on the river aux Raisins, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists, deposes and says, that, on the next day after the battle on the said river Raisin, a short time after sunrise, he saw the Indians kill the American prisoners with their tomahawks, and that they shot several, to wit, three; that the Indians set the house on fire, and that, in going out, the prisoners were massacred and killed as aforesaid, that is to say: three were shot, the others were killed in the houses, and burnt within the houses. The Indians burnt first the house of Jean Baptiste Jereau, and afterwards that of Gabriel Godfroy, Jr. The deponent has been informed that there were about forty-eight or forty-nine prisoners in the two houses. The deponent has seen dead bodies on the highway which the hogs were tearing and eating. Mr. Brunot told the deponent that the Indians had killed those of the prisoners who were least wounded, and that the others were burnt alive.

Antoine Cuiellarie and Alexis Salliot, inhabitants of river Ecorces, told the deponent that two prisoners had been burnt in the house of Grandon, on the river aux Sables. The deponent has heard that the Indians had torn out the hearts of the prisoners, and had brought them still smoking into the houses, but did not recollect the names of the informants; he believes, however, they were men worthy of credit.

The deponent says further, that, after the first action on the river Raisin, the Indians fired on one named Solo, son-in-law to Stephen Labeau, an inhabitant on the river aux Sables, when returning from the house of Grandon to his father-in-law. On his arrival, he hallooed to his father-in-law to open the door, saying that he was mortally wounded. Stephen Labeau opened the door, and told his son-in-law to throw himself on his bed; but that, in trying to move, he fell dead. An Indian knocked at the door, and Labeau, having opened it, received a ball in his breast, and fell dead. The son of Labeau made his escape; the Indians fired several shots at him, which did not reach him.

The deponent says further, that Baptiste Couture was killed near the house of the deponent, on the day of the second battle on the river Raisin, a little after sunrise.

The deponent says further, that the Indians have often threatened to burn his house and barn, if he did not march with them against the Americans. The deponent says, that he is an American citizen.

The deponent says that several of his neighbors have told him that they have received the same threat. Other settlements have been threatened with fire. The mills and houses on the river aux Roches were burnt in the month of

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

September last, after the capitulation of Detroit. And further this deponent saith not.

TERRITORY OF MICHIGAN,

District of Detroit, ss:

Be it remembered that, on this day, February the fourth, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, personally came before the undersigned, a justice of the peace for the district aforesaid, viz: John McDonell, an inhabitant of the city of Detroit, who, after being duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, depose and saith, that a few days after the battle of the 22d January last, (at the river Raisin,) he was personally present at the house of James May, Esquire, when he heard the said James May ask Mr. William Jones, the acting agent for the Indian Department, if there would be any impropriety in purchasing the prisoners from the Indians; and that he heard the said William Jones say, "that he thought there would be no impropriety in purchasing them, but would not undertake to authorize any person to do so;" that in consequence of which, this deponent purchased three or four of the prisoners; among the number was one by the name of ——— Hamilton, a private in the Kentucky volunteers, who declared to this deponent, that, on the first or second day after the battle at river Raisin, on 22d January last, as he and some of his fellow-prisoners were marching with the Indians between this place and the river Raisin, they came up to where one of the prisoners was burnt, the life just expiring, and an Indian kicking the ashes off his back, saying "damned son of a bitch."

This deponent also further depose, as aforesaid, that Doctor Bowers, a surgeon's mate of the Kentucky volunteers, who was purchased by him and some other gentlemen, stated to this deponent "that he was left to take care of the wounded after the battle, but felt rather timid on account of the savages, but that he received such assurances from Captain or Colonel Elliott of the safety of himself as well as the remaining prisoners, he concluded to stay, as sleighs were promised to be sent to fetch them away the next morning; that near about daylight of the morning following the day of the battle, the Indians came into the house where said Bowers was with the other prisoners, and proceeded to plunder and tomahawk such as could not walk, and stripping the said Bowers and the wounded prisoners of all their clothes; that while the said Bowers and two other prisoners, named Searles and Bradford, as near as this deponent can recollect, were sitting by the fire in the Indian camp, an Indian came up who appeared to be drunk, and called the said Searles, as near as this deponent can recollect, a Madison or Washington, then took up a tomahawk and struck the said Searles on the shoulder; that the said Searles caught hold of the tomahawk and held it for some time; that the said Bowers advised the said Searles to submit to his fate; with that the Indian gave him a second blow on the head, killed, scalped, and stripped him; during this time the said Bowers and Bradford were personally present, and being apprehensive for their own safety, that he, Bowers, ran and came up to the old chief (who sold him to this deponent and others) who took him under his protection, and was very kind to him while he remained with him. This deponent further depose, that he has reason to believe the aforesaid Bowers and Hamilton are now at Sandwich, and if applied to, they could give more ample information relative to the particulars of the aforesaid. And further this deponent saith not.

DEAR SIR: I had a conversation with Mr. Smart, after leaving your house to-day, who had a conversation with Bowers and Bradford. He observes that I have made several material errors in my affidavit before you this day. He says the prisoner killed was of the name of Blythe, instead of Searles; and mentioned some other errors that differ widely from what I had sworn to, so that I think it is a pity that Bowers's and Bradford's own affidavits could not be had, instead of mine. I wish you to mention to Judge Woodward that application is made for me by a friend on the other side to remain until the navigation opens. On that account, I hope that he will keep back the deposition that I have made regarding the murders committed by the savages on the river Raisin, as he has much better testimony to substantiate facts than what I have sworn to on hearsay; and, as I am sure, if the Colonel was even disposed to hear my application, that affidavit will be enough to send me off; or, else, if I was allowed to remain, Elliott would set the Indians on me.

I hereby certify, that the next day after the last battle on the river aux Raisins, the Secretary of the American General was taken, near the door of the deponent, was wounded, and placed on a horse; that seven or eight Indians were near the house, one of whom shot him in the head with a rifle; that he did not fall off his horse until another Indian, drawing a sabre, struck him on the head several times, and then he fell to the ground, was scalped, and stripped of his clothes, and left on the road, where he remained one day and a half. I, the deponent, with François Lasselle, Hubert Lacroix, and Lewis Chovin, on the evening of the second day, took up the body, carried it to the skirts of the woods, and covered it with a few branches, but could not stay to bury it for fear of the Indians that were in the neighborhood; and, on the next day after the last battle, I was near the house of Gabriel Godfroy, junior, and the house of Jean Batiste Jereau, where a great number of prisoners were collected; and that I heard the screaming of the prisoners whom the Indians were tomahawking; that the savages set the houses on fire, and went off.

The Hurons and the other tribes of Indians, assembled at the Miami rapids, to the inhabitants of the river Raisin:

FRIENDS, LISTEN! You have always told us you would give us any assistance in your power.

We, therefore, as the enemy is approaching us, within twenty-five miles, call upon you all to rise up, and come here immediately bringing your arms along with you.

Should you fail at this time, we will not consider you in future as friends, and the consequences may be very unpleasant.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

We are all convinced you have no writing forbidding you to assist us.

We are all your friends at present.

Extract from the report of Ensign Isaac L. Baker, Agent for the prisoners taken after the battle of Frenchtown, January 22, 1813, to Brigadier General Winchester, dated

"BRITISH NIAGARA, Feb. 26, 1813.

"For the greatest number of our unfortunate fellow-soldiers being sent from Detroit we are indebted to the exertions of our prisoner fellow-citizens there, who, with an unexampled generosity, when they saw their countrymen driven through the streets like sheep to a market, lavished their wealth for their ransom. Nor was the procuration of our liberty all. We had been almost entirely stripped by the Indians. Clothes, such as the exigency of the occasion permitted to be prepared, were furnished us.

"On the 8th instant, Colonel Proctor ordered me to make out a return of all the prisoners who were killed by the Indians in battle, agreeable to the best information I could collect. The enclosed return, marked B, was produced by this order. I might have added the gallant Captain Nathaniel Gray; S. Hart, deputy inspector general; Captain Virgil McCrackin, of Colonel Allen's regiment; Captain John H. Woolfolk, your secretary; Ensign Levi Wells, of the 7th United States' infantry; and a number of privates, whom I find, by subsequent information, have been massacred.

"The memory of past services rendered me by Captain Hart's family made me particularly anxious to ascertain his fate. I flattered myself he was alive, and every information I could get for some time flattered my hopes. But one of the last prisoners who was brought in, told me that the Captain was certainly massacred. He was so badly wounded as to prevent him from walking. The Indians took him some distance on a horse, but at length took him off and tomahawked him.

"About the 10th instant, an Indian brought Captain McCrackin's commission to Sandwich; the paper was bloody. The fellow said he took the Captain unhurt, but some time after, when stripping and examining him, he found an Indian scalp in his bosom, which induced him to kill him. This, you cannot but be assured, is a humbug of the fellow's own making, to screen himself from the odium of barbarity. The Captain's character, and the danger that attended his carrying such furniture in a disastrous battle, give it the lie.

"Captain Woolfolk, after having been wounded in two places, by some means had got refuge in one of the French houses on the Raisin. He was discovered next day, and dragged from his asylum. He was taken to the house of a Mr. Lasselle, where he said he would give one thousand dollars to any one who would purchase him. Mr. Lasselle said it was out of his power, but he had no doubt his brother would do it, who lived at hand. He directed his owners to the house of his brother, but as they were on their way, an Indian from a waste-house shot him through the head.

"Ensign Wells was taken by my side unhurt. I considered him as alive, until, on my arrival at this place, Captain Nags tells me he was killed by a Pottawatamy Indian, not long after he was taken.

"Many fresh scalps have been brought in since the battle, and dead bodies seen through the country, which prove that others have been killed, whose names I have not been able to find out, independent of those reported to Colonel Proctor.

"This, sir, is all the information I have been able to collect concerning those who were massacred. The fifteen or eighteen mentioned in the remarks to the return made to Colonel Proctor, whose names do not appear, were not known by those who saw them killed.

"Major Graves, of the fifth regiment of Kentucky volunteers, I have been able to get no information of, further than that he was brought to the river Rouge, on the 25th or 26th of January, in a sleigh. I fear, from our having heard nothing of him since, that he is no more, and that valuable officer forever lost to his country.

"The dead of our army are still denied the rites of sepulture. At the time I left Sandwich, I was told the hogs were eating them. A gentleman told me he had seen them running about with skulls, arms, legs, and other parts of the human system, in their mouths. The French people on the Raisin buried Captains Hart, Woolfolk, and some others, but it was more than their lives were worth to have been caught paying this last customary tribute to mortality.

"I several times agitated the subject of burying the dead, when in company with the British officers, but they always answered, that the Indians would not suffer it."

A return of the American prisoners who were tomahawked by the Indians subsequent to the battle at Frenchtown, January 22, 1813.

1. Pascal Hickman, Captain, 1st Kentucky volunteer rifle, January 23, in Frenchtown.

2. James E. Blythe, private, Hart's company, 5th Kentucky volunteer infantry, January 23, in Frenchtown.

3. Charles Gerles, private, Hart's company, 5th Kentucky volunteer infantry, January 23, Sandy Creek.

4. Thomas S. Crow, private, Seabree's company, 1st Kentucky volunteer infantry, January 23, three miles from Frenchtown.

5. Daniel Darnell, private, Williams' company, 5th Kentucky volunteer infantry, January 23, between Sandy Creek and Frenchtown.

6. Thomas Ward, private, Redding's company, 1st Kentucky volunteer infantry, January 23, between Sandy Creek and Frenchtown.

7. William Butler, private, Sanghorne's company, 1st Kentucky rifle, January 23, between Sandy Creek and Frenchtown.

8. Henry Downy, private, Edwards' company, 17th United States' infantry, January 24, near Brownstown.

9. John P. Sidney, Sergeant, Martin's company, 15th Kentucky volunteer infantry, January 25, River Rouge.

REMARKS.—In addition to the above number, I saw two others tomahawked at Sandy Creek myself, and find that the prisoners, now in the hospital in Sandwich, saw, say fifteen or eighteen others, treated in the same manner. Two men tell me they saw one who had the appearance of having been burned to death. Those men who saw Henry Downy and William Butler killed, tell me that the Indians left them without scalping.

Extract of a letter from Major General Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated at the Miami Rapids, February 11, 1813.

"I have the honor to enclose to you the deposition of Medard Labbadie, who was at the river Raisin on the 22d ultimo, and remained there till the 6th instant. His account of the loss of the enemy in the action is corroborated by several others, nor is there the least reason to doubt his statement, as it regards the horrible fate of our wounded men. There is another circumstance which plainly shows that the British have no intention to conduct the war (at least in this quarter) upon those principles which have been held sacred by all civilized nations. On the 30th ultimo, I despatched Doctor McKeehan, a surgeon's mate in the militia, with a flag, to ascertain the situation of our wounded. He was attended by one of our militiamen and a Frenchman. On the night after their departure, they halted near this place for the purpose of taking a few hours' sleep, in a vacant cabin upon the bank of the river. The carryall in which they travelled was left at the door with the flag set up in it. They were discovered by a party of Indians (accompanied, it is said, by a British officer) and attacked in the manner described in the deposition. The militiaman was killed and scalped, the Doctor and the Frenchman taken. Doctor McKeehan was furnished with a letter, addressed to any British officer whom he might meet, describing the character in which he went, and the object for which he was sent, an open letter to General Winchester, and written instructions to himself, all of which he was directed to show to the first officer he met with. He was also supplied with one hundred dollars in gold to procure necessities for the prisoners."

The affidavit of Medard Labbadie, late resident near the river Raisin, in the Michigan Territory.

He being sworn, saith, he was in his house when he heard the guns at the commencement of the action at the river Raisin, on the 22d January, 1813, between the American forces under General Winchester, and the British, Canadian, and Indian forces, said to be commanded by Col. St. George. After some little time, he heard that the Indians were killing the inhabitants as well as the Americans, upon which he went towards the scene of action, in order to save his family. As he went on, he was, with one other inhabitant, taken prisoner by two Wyandot Indians, and carried prisoner to the Indian lines, from which he saw great part of the action. The right wing of the Americans had given way before he got a sight of the action. It terminated after the sun was some hours high, not far from 11 o'clock, A. M., by the surrender of the American forces that then remained on the ground. He saw the flag hoisted by the British sent to the American forces, and saw it pass three times to the Americans before the surrender. He could not understand English, but understood that General Winchester was taken prisoner before he got to the lines of his own men; that he was compelled to carry the flag to his own forces after he was taken; that he understood the reason of the flag passing so often, was, that the Americans refused to surrender upon any other terms than that the wounded should be taken care of, the dead buried, and the inhabitants protected in their property. That the British first refused to agree to these terms, but finally did agree to them. He also understood that the loss of the British and Indians in the action was about four hundred killed. He also understood that the loss of the Americans in the action was about one hundred and eighty killed.

He knows that, on the day of the action, all the prisoners who were able to march, were marched off towards Malden, the wounded, about sixty or eighty in number, left in two houses, without any of their friends, or a physician, to take care of them, and without any British officer or men. About ten Indians remained behind upon the ground; the balance of the Indians went off with the British, and he was told by some of the Canadian militia, that the British had promised the Indians a frolic that night, at Stony Creek, about six miles from the river Raisin.

He was liberated after the line of march was formed for Malden. The next morning he was in the houses where the wounded were. That morning about fifty Indians returned; they brought whiskey with them; they drank some, and gave some to the Indians there, and between 9 and 10 o'clock, A. M., commenced killing the wounded, then set fire to the houses the wounded were in, and consumed them. He was at his father's, on this side of Detroit river, about seven days after the action, and saw across the river the prisoners marched off for Niagara, from Malden.

He saith that he saw taken by his house, by Captain Elliott, and nine Wyandot Indians, two men that he understood had been sent by General Harrison with a flag to the British. One of the men (Mr. Tessier) he knew, the other he did not know, but understood he was a doctor. He had not an opportunity of conversing with them, but understood from an inhabitant, to whom Mr. Tessier communicated it, that they stopped for the night and left the flag hoisted on the carryall; that the flag was taken away unknown to them, and that the Indians fired on them; that he, Tessier, told them they were Frenchmen, and surrendered, upon which the Indians ceased firing, and took them. They then mentioned they were sent with a flag. The Indians said they were liars, and took them off.

Mr. Tessier was set at liberty at the river Raisin, and remained two days expecting the doctor to return; at the end of which time, Tessier was sent for by the British, and taken to Malden. He understood that the doctor was sent off immediately to Niagara; the doctor was wounded in the ankle. He understood the British charged the doctor and Tessier with being spies. And further he saith not. M. LABBADIÉ.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, respecting a man named O'Neale, taken by the detachment from the squadron under the orders of Rear Admiral Cockburn. This man has been released upon the application of the magistrates of Havre de Grace, on parole.

I was not informed of this man being an Irishman, or he would certainly have been detained to account to his sovereign and country for being in arms against the British colors. I have, &c.

JOHN BORLASE WARREN.

Brigadier General MILLER,
Comm'g the U. S. forces, &c., Baltimore.

NICHOLASVILLE, Ky., April 24, 1813.

SIR: Yours of the 5th instant, requesting me to give you a statement respecting the late disaster at Frenchtown, was duly received. Rest assured, sir, that it is with sensations the most unpleasant that I undertake to recount the infamous and barbarous conduct of the British and Indians after the battle of the 22d January. The blood runs cold in my veins when I think of it.

On the morning of the 23d, shortly after light, six or eight Indians came to the house of Jean Baptiste Jereame, where I was, in company with Major Graves, Captains Hart and Hickman, Doctor Todd, and fifteen or twenty private volunteers, belonging to different corps. They did not molest any person or thing on their first approach, but kept sauntering about until there were a large number collected, (say one or two hundred,) at which time they commenced plundering the houses of the inhabitants, and the massacre of the wounded prisoners. I was one among the first that was taken prisoner, and was taken to a horse about twenty paces from the house, after being divested of a part of my clothing, and commanded by signs there to remain for further orders. Shortly after being there, I saw them knock down Captain Hickman at the door, together with several others with whom I was not acquainted. Supposing a general massacre had commenced, I made an effort to get to a house about one hundred yards distant, which contained a number of wounded, but, on reaching the house, to my great mortification, found it surrounded by Indians, which precluded the possibility of my giving notice to the unfortunate victims of savage barbarity. An Indian chief of the Tawa tribe, by the name of McCarty, gave me possession of his horse and blanket, telling me, by signs, to lead the horse to the house which I had just before left. The Indian that first took me, by this time came up and manifested a hostile disposition towards me, by raising his tomahawk as if to give the fatal blow, which was prevented by my very good friend McCarty. On my reaching the house which I had first started from, I saw the Indians take off several prisoners, which I afterwards saw in the road in a most mangled condition, and entirely stripped of their clothing.

Messrs. Bradford, Searls, Turner, and Blythe, were collected around a carryall, which contained articles taken by the Indians from the citizens. We had all been placed there, by our respective captors, except Blythe, who came where we were, entreating an Indian to convey him to Malden, promising to give him forty or fifty dollars, and whilst in the act of pleading for mercy, an Indian, more savage than the other, stepped up behind, tomahawked, stripped, and scalped him. The next that attracted my attention, was the houses on fire that contained several wounded, whom I knew were not able to get out. After the houses were nearly consumed, we received marching orders, and after arriving at Sandy Creek, the Indians called a halt, and commenced cooking; after preparing and eating a little sweetened gruel Messrs. Bradford, Searls, Turner, and myself, re ceived some, and were eating, when an Indian came up and proposed exchanging his moccasins for Mr. Searls' shoes, which he readily complied with. They then exchanged hats, after which the Indian inquired how many men Harrison had with him, and, at the same time, calling Searls a Washington or Madison, then raised his tomahawk and struck him on the shoulder, which cut into the cavity of the body. Searls then caught hold of the tomahawk and appeared to resist, and upon my telling him that his fate was inevitable, he closed his eyes and received the savage blow which terminated his existence. I was near enough to him to receive the brains and blood, after the fatal blow, on my blanket. A short time after the death of Searls, I saw three others share a similar fate. We then set out for Brownstown, which place we reached about twelve or one o'clock at night. After being exposed to several hours incessant rain in reaching that place, we were put into the council house, the floor of which was partly covered with water, at which place we remained until the next morning, when we again received marching orders for their village on the river Rouge, which place we made that day, where I was kept six days, then taken to Detroit and sold. For a more detailed account of the proceedings, I take the liberty of referring you to a publication which appeared in the public prints, signed by Ensign J. L. Baker, and to the publication of Judge Woodward, both of which I have particularly examined, and find them to be literally correct, so far as came under my notice.

I am, sir, with due regard, your fellow-citizen,

JESSAMINE COUNTY, to wit:

This day Gustavus M. Bower personally came before me, John Metcalf, one of the Commonwealth's Justices of the Peace, in and for said county, and made oath to the truth of assertions before stated by the said Bower. Given under my hand this 24th day of April, 1813.

JOHN METCALF.

LEXINGTON, May 2, 1813.

SIR: I received your letter sometime since, relative to the disastrous affair of Frenchtown, of 22d and 23d January last. For the particulars of the action, and the terms of capitulation, I refer you to the official report of General Winchester, which is correct as far as came within my knowledge. After the capitulation, I was introduced to Colonel Proctor, the commander of the British forces and Indians, as one of the surviving surgeons, and by him was requested to attend to our wounded who were left on the ground where the action was fought. I willingly acquiesced, and Doctor Bowers, my mate, remained with me: at the same time I informed Colonel Proctor of my apprehensions for the safety of the wounded and the surgeons; he replied, "be under no apprehensions, you will be perfectly safe, I will place you under the special care of the chiefs until morning, and very early I will send conveyances for the wounded and yourself to Amherstburg." Shortly after, I was requested to ascertain the number and rank of the wounded, and in so doing was assisted by a British officer, (whose name I did not know,) to whom I likewise communicated my apprehensions of safety; he manifested some irritation at my doubts of British honor and magnanimity, and assured me protection would be afforded me. While engaged in this business, one of the rooms occupied by the wounded was crowded with the Indians who were peaceable, but one of them, who could speak English, admonished the British officer of the propriety of stationing interpreters in the houses. Upon my return from this business to the room I occupied, and which was set apart for the wounded officers, I met, and was made acquainted with, Captain Elliott, at present a British officer, who had visited Captain Hart, then wounded. Captain Hart was solicitous to be removed that evening, and Captain Elliott replied, if it was possible (and every exertion should be made) he should, and if it could not be effected that evening, early in the morning he would call for him in his own train (sleigh) and convey him to his own house in Amherstburg, where he should remain until recovered, assuring him repeatedly no danger was to be apprehended, and, if possible, he would remain with him that night.

In the afternoon Captain Elliott and every British officer left the encampment, leaving behind three interpreters. From the repeated assurances my apprehensions were quieted; for who could doubt? About one hour before daylight (for my duties required my attention nearly all the night) the interpreters suddenly disappeared. About an hour after daylight the Indians began to collect in the town, and commenced plundering the houses in which the wounded were placed, and then stripped them and myself of our clothing. At this time the room I had occupied was so crowded with Indians, and Captain Hart's wound, already painful, being injured by them, I conveyed him to an adjoining house which had been plundered and was empty, where I met the Indian, (who, on the preceding day, had requested that interpreters should be left,) and he knew my rank. He inquired why the surgeons were left, and why the wounded were left? I replied, it was the wish of Colonel Proctor we should remain until he could send for us; and Captain Hart informed him Captain Elliott was a friend of his, and was to call for him that morning. He shook his head significantly, and replied they were damned rascals, or we would have been taken off the preceding day. The Indian informed me every individual would be killed, and requested me to be quiet, for the chiefs were then in council, and "may be" only the wounded would be killed. Captain Hart offered him $100 to take him to Malden. He replied, you are too badly wounded. While we were conversing, one of the wounded was tomahawked at our feet.

Manner in which the War is waged by the Enemy.

Shortly after the Indian returned and told me I was a prisoner, and must go. I was taken by the Indian to the house I had left, and there discovered that Captain Hickman and two others had, in my absence, been tomahawked, scalped, and stripped. I was tied and taken by this Indian towards Malden about four miles, when I came to the encampment of the British wounded, and met with Captain Elliott and the surgeon of the 41st regiment. Captain Elliott immediately recognised me, and inquired the cause of my situation. I informed him what had taken place, and requested him to send back immediately; that some who were badly wounded might still be alive, and could be saved, and particularly named Captain Hart, for whom he manifested much friendship. Captain Elliott replied, it is now too late; you may rest assured that those who are once taken by the Indians are safe, and will be taken to Malden, and those who are badly wounded are killed ere this. I replied, many are unable to walk, and some will be killed after making an effort, and walking several miles, who might be saved. To which he replied, charity begins at home; my own wounded are to be conveyed first, and if any sleighs remain they shall be sent back for your wounded. My anxiety to get some person to return, in hopes of saving some of the prisoners, induced me at length to make an appeal to their avarice. The surgical instruments of the detachment were left in the room I occupied, and I informed the surgeon of their value and importance at that time; he immediately despatched an interpreter for them, who returned with the information that they were destroyed in the burning of the house, and gave additional confirmation of the massacre of the wounded. I was released from the Indians by Captain Elliott and the surgeon. At this time my brother, who was wounded, and several others, were in possession of the Indians, who were taking them towards Malden. I requested their release, and permission for them to accompany me on foot under British protection. Captain Elliott told me it was impossible, and to be under no fears, they were safe; for he knew the fidelity of the Indians with whom they were. When the intelligence of the massacre was by me communicated to Captain Elliott and the surgeon, they appeared much exasperated, and declared it was impossible to restrain the savages. The cause he then assigned to me was, that when the Indians discovered their loss in killed and wounded, and that of the British, they started off towards our wounded, declaring they would have satisfaction, and, he continued, I was fearful of the event. During the plunder and the massacre our wounded conducted themselves with the utmost composure and resignation, and made no resistance, which they knew would be fruitless, and destruction to all.

It was asserted by Colonel Proctor, in a conversation at Amherstburg, that the Indians had got some whiskey in the house where we were stationed, and had become intoxicated. That the Indians may have had some whiskey I shall not deny; but I think I can safely say, that they did not procure it there, and that was not the cause of the massacre; for, on the preceding days, and subsequent to the action of the 18th, I wanted some spirits, and made application to the house-keeper, who assured me there was none about the house, for it was all consumed by the British and Indians, who had quartered in the house prior to the action of the 18th; besides, the Indians showed no manifestation of drunkenness; their deliberate pilfering, and their orderly conduct throughout, was not such as would be expected from drunken Indians.

Upon my arrival at Malden, I was again solicited to take charge of the wounded; the surgery was opened to me, and I had the use of the medicines and dressings necessary, and they had as comfortable rooms as could be procured. During our stay in Malden some eight or ten of the wounded were brought in by the Indians; several made their escape who were doomed to massacre, and found protection with the inhabitants of the Territory, who brought them into Malden; and several made their escape, wandered in, and delivered themselves up at the fort. Prior to our leaving Malden one poor fellow was brought in scalped alive by the Indians, and delivered up to the British; but before I reached him death put an end to his sufferings. I frequently, and on every occasion, urged the British officers to exert themselves and procure the release of the wounded from the Indians, urging the necessity of having their wounds dressed. In a conversation on this subject with Captain Elliott, and while urging it, he replied, the Indians are excellent surgeons. The prisoners were all marched off to Sandwich, after remaining a few days at Malden, and I was called upon to know how many from their wounds were unable to march, who had sleighs furnished them, which was the case during the march to Fort George. Before I conclude, I must say, that the terms of capitulation were violated in every particular by the enemy. The wounded were not protected; private property was not held sacred; and our side arms were not restored. With a few exceptions, I was treated respectfully by the British officers, save the abuse which was lavished on my Government, and that was by no means sparingly bestowed.

I am, respectfully, yours, &c.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,

STATE OF KENTUCKY,

On the 21st day of April, 1813, I, John Dawson, an orderly sergeant in Captain Glave's company of the first regiment Kentucky volunteer militia, being detailed off, and attached to Captain Wriël Seabrees' company, and was in the battle of the 18th of January, and did not receive a wound, but on the 22d, about 9 o'clock, received a shot under the right arm, which lodged between the ribs. After the capitulation of our troops, there came a paymaster of the British army in the house where I was, to take the number of wounded that was in the house. I asked, what was to be done with us? he replied, "don't make yourself uneasy about that, you shall be protected this night by a strong guard which shall be left with you." But, to my sad misfortune, I found there were but three interpreters left, and in the night an officer took two of them away, and in the morning the other one said he could not talk Indian. So when the Indians came in the morning they broke open the doors of the houses, began to tomahawk, scalp, and plunder, then set fire to the houses which contained the prisoners; with this I got up, put on my great coat, put up my knapsack, and went out of doors. I had not been out more than one minute before an Indian came up to me and took the coat off my back; also another Indian told me to put my knapsack in his sled. At this time Major Graves and Captain Hart were out in the yard. I heard Captain Hart make a bargain with an Indian to take him to Malden, which the Indian agreed so to do, for the sum of one hundred dollars. I saw the Indian put a pair of socks on Hart, and put him on a horse; this was the last I saw of Hart. I then saw a man riding, whom I thought was a British officer. I made up to him, but found that he was an Indian who was aid-de-camp to General Roundhead; he had with him, when I came up, twelve men. It was at the mouth of a lane where I overtook him, where there were two Indians scalping two men; he halloosed to them to give way; they did so. After this we went on; and on Sandy Creek, about three miles from the battle ground, I saw Major Graves in an Indian sleigh; this is the last account of him that I could ascertain. We went on that night to Brownstown, and in the morning of the 24th a man gave out walking, with the rheumatic pains, who was by the name of Downey. The Indians tomahawked him, and then stripped him. We then marched on above Detroit, on the river Rouge. I staid with them seven days. They then took me into Detroit, (leaving a young man in the camp by the name of John Davenport,) and sold me to Major Muir, who commands Fort Detroit. I then was sent over to Sandwich; there I stayed until the 8th of February; they marched me to Fort George, and — me on the 19th of February, 1813. The above is a true statement, as far as I saw, though I saw numbers massacred that I did not know.

During my confinement with the Indians, whilst at their camps, they showed more humanity than the British.

Given under my hand, this 21st day of April, 1813.

JOHN DAWSON.

PENDLETON COUNTY, ss:

I, William Mountjoy, one of the Commonwealth's Justices of the Peace for the State of Kentucky, in and for said county, do certify, that the foregoing certificate of John Dawson was written, subscribed, and sworn to before me.

Given under my hand, this 21st day of April, 1813.

WILLIAM MOUNTJOY.

STATE OF KENTUCKY,

Pendleton County, in town of Falmouth:

On the 21st day of April, 1813, I, Thomas Pollard, a private of Captain Glave's company, of the first regiment of Kentucky volunteer militia, was in battles, fought with the British and Indian army on the 18th and 22d of January last, at the River Raisin, and after the surrender of our army as prisoners of war on the 22d, upon the assurances of the British officers, promising protection to my wounded fellow-soldiers, and that they would send carryalls for them the next day. Although I had received no injury in either of the actions fought on the 18th and 22d, I voluntarily stayed to assist and comfort my messmates, John Dawson, Albert Ammerman, and Jesse Green, all of whom had received wounds by balls.

I have first examined the statement made and sworn to by John Dawson, hereto annexed, and witnessed every circumstance therein stated to be truly stated, within my own knowledge. The Indian who bargained with Captain Hart to take him to Fort Malden for one hundred dollars, and took charge of him, put him on a horse and started on his way, spoke good enough the English tongue for us to understand the contract.

THOMAS POLLARD.

PENDLETON COUNTY, ss:

I, William Mountjoy, one of the Commonwealth's Justices of the Peace for the State of Kentucky, in and for said county, do certify, that the foregoing certificate of Thomas Pollard was subscribed and sworn to before me.

WM. MOUNTJOY.

STATE OF KENTUCKY,

Pendleton County, in town of Falmouth:

On the 21st day of April, 1813, I, Albert Ammerman, a private of Captain Glave's company, of the first regiment of Kentucky volunteer militia, being wounded in the battle of the 18th January last, at the River Raisin, by a ball in the flesh of the thigh; and from the window of the house which was appropriated for an hospital, was a witness to the battle of the 22d of the same month. And after the surrender, I being but slightly wounded, proposed marching with the rest of the prisoners, and was prevented by the order of a British officer, who said that a guard would be left to take care of the wounded, and carryalls would be sent for them to ride into Malden on the next morning. But to my astonishment no guard was left, and, about sunrise on the morning of the 23d, a party of Indians returned to the hospital, and the first Indian that came to the room I was lodged in could speak the English language. He was asked by one of the wounded, what was to be done with the wounded. He replied they were all to be killed that could not walk; and shortly after a general massacre commenced. I instantly put on my knapsack and went out of the house; my knapsack was demanded by an Indian at the door, to whom I gave it. He conducted me to a log some little distance from the house, on which I sat down, where I witnessed the butchery of many of my fellow-citizens, sufferers by the tomahawk and scalping knife, and, to finish the scene, set fire to the houses occupied by the wounded prisoners; many of them, struggling in the arms of death, put their heads out of the windows whilst enveloped in smoke and flames. After this bloody work was finished, I was marched off in the direction towards Brownstown, by an Indian, and when about half a mile from Frenchtown on our way, was overtaken by two Indians who had Captain Hart in custody, mounted on a horse. As they approached nearly to us, I noticed they were speaking loud and animated as if in a quarrel, but, not understanding their language, did not understand what passed between them, but think it was probable that the quarrel was occasioned respecting one hundred dollars which I understood Captain Hart had given to one of the Indians aforesaid to convey him to Fort Malden. The quarrel appeared to grow very warm, so much so, that the Indians took aim at each other with their guns; and, as if to settle the dispute, it appeared to me as if they had mutually agreed to kill Captain Hart, and plunder him of the rest of his money and effects, which they did, by taking him off his horse, then knocked him down with a war club, scalped and tomahawked him, and stripped him naked, leaving his body on the ground. I was gratified in observing that, during this scene of trial, Captain Hart refrained from supplication or entreaty, but appeared perfectly calm and collected. He met his fate with that firmness which was his particular characteristic. No other prisoner of our army of the United States was present to witness this melancholy scene—the death of Captain Hart. During my captivity with the Indians, five days only, I was treated with more hospitality than I had any reason to expect; much more so than I experienced from the British, after I was ransomed at Detroit, by Mr. Benjamin Chittenden, who will ever be entitled to my utmost gratitude; by him I was humanely treated, and also by some of the French Canadians.

LEXINGTON, April 13, 1813.

SIR: You request of me a statement of facts, within my own knowledge, concerning the murder of our men after the battle and surrender at Frenchtown.

I was one of those who was taken by the Indians on the retreat, about one and a half miles from where the action first commenced. Just before we were taken, with the assistance of Lieutenant Chinn, belonging to the militia, I formed between fifteen and twenty men. I then discovered the Indians running upon us on each side and in front, about sixty in number, with their arms at a trail. I discovered there was no chance to repel them. I ordered the men to ground their arms, which was done; the Indians then came up and secured the arms of our men, and shot them, including the Lieutenant before mentioned. I was the only one saved. I was taken and delivered up to Captain Elliott, a British officer.

As to the murder of the wounded, I know nothing of my own knowledge.

Your obedient servant,

A. GARRETT.

HON. JESSE BLEDSOE.

FAYETTE COUNTY, ss :

This day, Lieutenant Ashton Garrett, of the 17th regiment United States' infantry, came before me, and made oath, that the foregoing statement is just and true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

Given under my hand, this 13th day of April, 1813.

JOHN H. MORTON, J. P.

STATE OF KENTUCKY,

Fayette County, ss :

Personally appeared before me, a justice of the peace for the county aforesaid, Charles Bradford, an inhabitant of the town of Lexington, State of Kentucky, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists, deposeth and saith, that he was in the actions at the river Raisin, on the 18th and 22d January last; that he was wounded in the right hip, and remained at Frenchtown after the capitulation; that, on the 22d, before the prisoners (who were able to walk) were marched for Malden, he saw Captain William Elliott, with whom he had been formerly acquainted, and of whom he inquired, personally, what would be done with the wounded prisoners? whether they would be taken to Malden that evening with the other prisoners, or not? He said they would not be taken to Malden that evening, but a strong guard would be left to protect them against any outrage the Indians might be disposed to commit. Elliott had a similar conversation with Major Graves, Captains Hart and Hickman, and Doctors Todd and Bowers, in the presence of this deponent. He, Elliott, further stated that sleighs would be sent to convey the wounded to Malden the next morning. This deponent further says, that the British marched away; no guard was left to protect the wounded; and that Captain Elliott, when asked the reason, observed that some interpreters were left whose influence among the Indians was greater, and that they were better able to protect us than a guard. About two or three o'clock in the morning of the 23d January, this deponent discovered that the interpreters had left the house in which he was, and he never saw them afterwards; that between day-light and sun rise, on the 23d, he saw a large number of Indians come to the house; they burst open the door, and in a few minutes commenced plundering the prisoners, and tomahawking those who were unable to walk. This deponent left the house as soon as possible, and went into the yard, where a number of his fellow-prisoners had assembled. He was there claimed as a prisoner by an Indian, who gave him some articles to hold whilst he plundered more. At this time he was standing with Doctor Bowers, and James E. Blythe, when an Indian, without any provocation, tomahawked Blythe, and scalped him. Shortly after, they (the Indians) set fire to the houses in which the wounded had been quartered, and burnt them down, with the bodies of those whom they had murdered. This deponent was then taken by the Indians, in company with Doctor Bowers, Charles Searls, Julius Turner, and several others, to Sandy Creek; that on the way he saw a number of the prisoners who had been tomahawked; that, whilst at Sandy Creek, they murdered Charles Searls, Thomas S. Crow, and three or four others. That this deponent was then packed with forty or fifty pounds weight, and taken to the river Rouge, where the Indians had encamped; that, whilst he was there, he inquired of an Indian whether he would take him to Malden, as he wished to be given to Captain Elliott. The Indian said, if Captain Elliott told him to do so he would, as they always did as he requested them. This deponent was six days with the Indians before they took him to Detroit, where he was purchased by Stephen Mack and Oliver W. Miller, for eighty dollars. That the British officer commanding at Detroit (Major Muir) again claimed him as a British prisoner, notwithstanding his having just been ransomed from their allies (by his own countrymen) and sent him to Sandwich, where he remained until the 9th or 10th February, when he was sent to Fort George, and there paroled. This deponent states, that, while a prisoner at Sandwich, he was several times treated insultingly by the British officers, and by one John McGregor; that the citizens, generally, treated the prisoners with kindness and attention as far as was in their power.

This being the first opportunity the deponent has had of expressing his gratitude to the American citizens who treated the prisoners with so much friendship and humanity at Detroit, cannot refrain from so doing; and, as long as he lives, the names of Messrs. Mack, Miller, Smart, Woodward, Williams, McDonald, Hunt, Mays, &c., shall never be forgotten. C. BRADFORD.

Sworn and subscribed to before me, this 29th day of April, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to present you, by the hands of Lieutenant Dudley, the British standard taken at York on the 27th of April last, accompanied by the mace over which was hung a human scalp.

These articles were taken from the Parliament House by one of my officers, and presented to me. The scalp I caused to be presented to General Dearborn, who I believe still has it in his possession. I also send, by the same gentleman, one of the British flags taken at Fort George on the 27th of May.

Outrages at Hampton, in Virginia.

Extract of a letter from General Taylor to Admiral Warren, dated HEADQUARTERS, NORFOLK, June 29, 1813.

"I have heard with grief and astonishment of the excesses, both to property and persons, committed by the land troops who took possession of Hampton. The respect I entertain for your personal character leads me to make known these excesses. It would not become me to suggest what course of inquiry and punishment is due to the honor of your arms. But the world will suppose those acts to have been approved, if not excited, which are passed over with impunity. I do not, however, deprecate any measures you may think necessary or proper, but am prepared for any species of warfare which you may be disposed to prosecute. It is for the sake of humanity I enter this protest.

"We are, in this part of the country, merely in the noviciate of our warfare. The character it will hereafter assume, whether of mildness or ferocity, will materially depend on the first operations of our arms, and on the personal character and dispositions of the respective commanders.

"For myself, I assure you most solemnly, that I neither have authorized, nor will sanction, any outrage on humanity or the laws of civil warfare. On the contrary, I think it due, no less to my personal honor than to that of my country, to repress and punish every excess. I hope that these sentiments will be reciprocated. It will depend on you whether the evils inseparable from a state of war shall, in our operations, be tempered by the mildness of civilized life, or, under your authority, be aggravated by all the fiend-like passions which can be instilled into them.

H. B. M. SHIP SAN DOMINGO,
Hampton Roads, June 29, 1813.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day, stating that you had communicated to your Government the proposal of an exchange of prisoners, and, also, that some excesses had been committed by the troops in the late affair at Hampton. I have communicated to my friend, Sir Sidney Beckwith, the commander of His Majesty's forces on shore, this part of your letter, and he will have the honor of writing to you upon the points to which it alludes.

I beg leave to assure you that it is my wish to alleviate the misfortunes of the war commenced against my country, by every means in my power; at the same time, I am prepared to meet any result that may ensue between the two nations.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient faithful humble servant,

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,
Admiral of the Blue, &c.

H. M. SHIP SAN DOMINGO,

SIR: Admiral Sir John B. Warren having communicated to me the contents of your letter, I lose no time in assuring you that your wish cannot exceed mine to carry on war with every attention to the unfortunate individuals in whose immediate vicinity military operations may take place. In this spirit I shall vie with you to the utmost. At the same time, I ought to state to you that the excesses of which you complain at Hampton were occasioned by a proceeding of so extraordinary a nature, that, if I had not been an eye-witness, I could not have credited it. At the recent attempt on Craney island, the troops in a barge sunk by the fire of your guns, clung to the wreck of the boat. Several Americans, I assure you most solemnly, waded off from the island, and, in the presence of all engaged, fired upon and shot these poor fellows. With a feeling natural to such a proceeding, the men of that corps landed at Hampton.

That occurrences of that kind may never occur again, and that the troops of each nation may be guided by sentiments of honor and humanity, is the earnest wish of, sir, your very obedient servant,

SIDNEY BECKWITH,
Quarter Master General.

JAMES MAURICE,
Major, Acting A. A. G.

HEADQUARTERS, NORFOLK, July 1, 1813.

SIR: It affords me the highest satisfaction to receive your assurance that you wish "to carry on war with every attention to the unfortunate individuals in whose immediate vicinity military operations may take place." Such sentiments can alone give splendor to courage, and confer honor on military skill. Worthless is the laurel steeped in female tears, and joyless the conquests which have inflicted needless woe on the peaceful and unresisting. The frankness with which you admit the excesses at Hampton is a guarantee against the repetition.

I cannot doubt, sir, your conviction that the scene described by you at Craney island was really acted; but, the very reason it appeared to you incredible and inhuman, it should have been unauthorized. Your own perception of propriety shall decide, if facts should not have been ascertained, and redress demanded, before retaliation was resorted to—a retaliation, too, extravagant in its measure, applying not to the perpetrators of the alleged offence, or their comrades, but to the innocent and helpless. I have reason to think that you are mistaken in your impressions of the conduct of our troops at Craney island. That they waded into the water on the sinking of your boat is true; but I learn that it was for the purpose of securing their conquest, and assisting the perishing. One person (perhaps more) was shot, but it was only for a continued effort to escape, after repeated offers of safety on surrender: such, at least, is the representation made to me. If, however, your yielding troops have been butchered, it is due to the honor of our arms to disclaim and punish the enormity. The fame of my country shall never be tarnished by such conduct in the troops under my command. I have to-day ordered an inquiry into the facts, by a board of field officers. Proper measures shall be taken to punish whatsoever of impropriety may have been committed. I flatter myself you will perceive in these measures a disposition to afford no cause of reproach in any future conflict. When we meet, let us combat as soldiers, jealous of the honor of our respective countries, anxious to surpass each other as well in magnanimity as in courage.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my consideration and respect.

ROBT. B. TAYLOR,
Brig. Gen. Comm'g.

A copy. JOHN MYERS, Aid-de-Camp.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Taylor to the Secretary of War, dated

NORFOLK, July 2, 1813.

I enclose, as was promised yesterday, copies of the letters written to Admiral Warren and General Beckwith. My aid, who carried them down, yesterday, brought back a letter from Admiral Warren, of which a copy is enclosed, and has made a statement of what occurred in his conference with the General.

The letter of the Admiral, though polite, is certainly not responsive to anything which has occurred, and the conversation with the General, though equally civil, is obviously designed to prevent any further discussion of the subject. From the report of prisoners and deserters, there is too much reason to believe that, before the attack on Craney island, the cupidity of the troops had been excited by a promise of the pillage of Norfolk. To inflame their resentment, after their failure, and to keep alive the hope of plunder at Norfolk, there is much reason to fear that our troops have unmeritedly been charged with misconduct at Craney island, and that made a pretext for their excesses and their conduct at Hampton. I entertain no doubt of the justification of the honor and magnanimity of our men, by the reports of the board of officers. I do not mean that the subject shall drop, but when I communicate the report, I shall leave the British commander the alternative, either of adopting similar measures in his own army, or remaining under the imputation of having excited their troops to commit these excesses. Our troops are highly inflamed.

Notes for Captain Myers in his interview with Admiral Warren.

A defenceless and unresisting town has been given up to indiscriminate pillage, though civilized war tolerates this only as to fortified places, carried by assault, and after summons.

Individuals have been stripped naked; a sick man stabbed twice in the hospital; a sick man shot, at Pembroke, in his bed, and in the arms of his wife, long after the defeat of the troops; his wife also shot at, and wounded—a Mr. and Mrs. Kirby.

Females have been not only assaulted, and personally abused and struck, but even violated.

If occasion offers, notice may be immediately made of the information, given by prisoners and deserters, of the promise to plunder Norfolk.

As to the imputation of our troops at Craney island, if Admiral Warren should mention it, deny the fact, and state the actual conduct of our troops, in going into the water to assist their men, and then giving them refreshments as soon as they entered the fort. Refer to the conduct of all our prisoners, particularly those taken from the boats of the Victorious.

JOHN MYERS,
Captain and Aid-de-Camp.

HEADQUARTERS, NORFOLK, July 2, 1813.

SIR: In obedience to your orders I proceeded, yesterday, with a flag of truce, to Admiral Warren, in Hampton Roads, to whom I handed both the despatch for himself and that for Sir Sidney Beckwith. The Admiral received me with civility, and with many acknowledgments for the terms of your letter. Sir Sidney was on shore at Old Point Comfort. Feeling some difficulty about the propriety of delaying on board for his arrival, I was about to depart, but Admiral Warren expressed a wish that I would remain, saying that he would desire, no doubt, to give a reply.

Sir Sidney did not arrive till 8 o'clock. He expressed great respect for the motives that had actuated you, sir, in the measures which you were pursuing. They were more than he desired. It was sufficient, he said, if your own mind was satisfied. He expressed regret at the trouble you had taken, and much deference for your character, with a resolution to vie with you in efforts to confine future operations within the bounds of humanity, and the usages of war. He said, in allusion to the pretended conduct of our men at Craney island, that it proceeded no doubt from a few of the more disorderly. I denied the charge altogether, as I had done in my previous interview, when it was made the justification of their outrages at Hampton, on the ground of retaliation.

I found that it was not his intention to give to your despatch a written reply. By the light manner in which he glanced at the subject of your investigation, I could perceive that it was pressed further than was desirable to him. It was my wish, however, to be able to report to you the probability of a like course of inquiry on his part, and I enumerated the catalogue of abuses and violence at Hampton. I mentioned the pillage of the town, and the wanton destruction of medicine; that individuals had been stripped naked; a sick man stabbed twice, who was in the hospital; a sick man shot in his bed, at Pembroke, and in the arms of his wife, who was also shot at, and wounded, long after the defeat of the troops—a Mr. and Mrs. Kirby; and finally, the assault on females, their being struck, and personally abused, and even violated.

At the mention of the murder of Kirby, and the wound given to his wife, Sir Sidney distinctly admitted it; the others he appeared not to be acquainted with the particulars of, and expressed some concern at it. He said that he had, however, on coming to a knowledge of their conduct, immediately ordered the embarkation of the troops that were concerned, with a determination that they should not again land; and that, while he was unable to control a past event, the responsibility of a recurrence should rest on himself; that the troops under his command were strangers to him, on his arrival here, and appealing to my knowledge of the nature of the war in Spain, in which these men (meaning the French corps) he said had been trained, told me they could not be restrained.

Thus far he thought he could not give a more convincing proof of the sincerity of his professions, than in the withdrawal of these troops, and that he had, moreover, just been employed in finding a new watering place on Back river, in order to remove from Hampton, and to quiet the minds of the inhabitants.

He assured me that in making such a pledge, as he was doing, it should not be lightly regarded. That he would either send away these troops, or wait the arrival of others, for new operations. He concluded by expressing a hope that you, sir, would in future use no reserve in communicating any subject of impropriety; and, on his part, that he should certainly do so, with due regard to the liberality of your conduct. He hoped the subject was at rest. I took my leave.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JOHN MYERS.

Captain and Aid-de-Camp.

Brig. Gen. ROBERT B. TAYLOR, Norfolk.

Extracts of a letter from General Taylor to Sir Sidney Beckwith, Quartermaster General, commanding the land forces of his Britannic Majesty, at Hampton Roads, dated

"I have now the honor to transmit to you the proceedings of the board of officers convened to inquire into the transactions at Craney island. They doubtless will convince you that, in that affair, the American troops merited no censure; that their conduct was distinguished by humanity and magnanimity; and that the distance to which you were removed from the scene, by rendering it impossible that you could be informed of the motives of their conduct, unhappily led you to draw conclusions equally mistaken and unmerited.

"You have done me the justice to declare that the measures pursued by me evince a disposition to permit, in my troops, no abuses on humanity, or the laws of authorized war. As I cannot doubt the existence of similar sentiments with you, I have a right to expect, on your part, measures equally decisive and unambiguous. If I have deemed it needful to forbid openly, to my whole army, all acts of impropriety, and to direct a public investigation of charges believed to be unmerited, but having the sanction of your imputation, I put it to your candor to determine, if excesses in your troops, admitted by yourself, and some of them of the most atrocious character, should pass unnoticed. My conduct, and your declarations, give me a claim to ask that these excesses be punished. Your army will then learn the abhorrence you feel for such acts, and be restrained, by the fear of your indignation, from similar outrages. But if these admitted excesses are passed by, the impunity of the past will be construed, by your troops, into an encouragement of future outrages, and your own humane intentions be completely defeated. Neither can you be unmindful of the propriety of taking, from my army the pretexts for impropriety, by a knowledge of effectual restraints on yours.

"I am fully impressed with the liberality of your conduct in promising to remove the troops who committed the outrages of Hampton from the opportunity of repeating these enormities. But, besides that my confidence in the gallantry of the American troops forbids me to desire any diminution of your force, and such a measure being liable to misconception, by our own troops, might not attain your object. The rank and file of an army seldom reason very profoundly, and however erroneously, might ascribe their withdrawal to the desertions which have, on every opportunity, taken place in that corps, and in their unwillingness, if any should have been displayed, to fire on the American troops. If this should unfortunately be the case, your force will be diminished, without securing the great ends of discipline and humanity for which you had, with so much liberality, made the sacrifice. I am the more pressing on this subject, because I have reason to believe that, even since your assurance, though unquestionably against your wishes, very improper acts have been committed by the troops on James river. The domestic property of peaceable private citizens, respected by all civilized nations, has been pillaged, and what furnished no allurements to cupidity has been wantonly defaced and destroyed.

"If such acts are either directed, or sanctioned, it is important to us, and to the world, to know what species of warfare the arms of Great Britain mean to wage. If authorized, it will be of little practical avail to know, that the director of these arms entertains the most liberal personal dispositions, while these dispositions remain dormant and inoperative.

"If I am troublesome on this subject, charge it to my anxious desire that nothing may occur to embitter our own feelings, and those of our respective nations. In the progress of the war, charges of inhumanity have unhappily been frequent and reciprocal. I am not indifferent to the infamy which such a charge fixes on the officer, who either encourages or permits it. I derive the highest satisfaction from the assurances you have given of similar sentiments. We have, sir, become enemies, by the sacred obligations we owe our respective countries. But, on the great and expanded subject of human happiness, we should be friends by the sympathy of our feelings. Let us then cordially unite, and exercising effectually the powers with which our Governments have invested us, give to our warfare a character of magnanimity, conferring equal honor on ourselves, and on our countries."

Extract from General Orders.

NORFOLK, July 1st, 1813.

Assistant Adjutant General's Office.

The General commanding has deemed it proper to remonstrate against the excesses committed by the British troops who took possession of Hampton. It has been attempted to justify, or palliate, these excesses, on the ground of inhumanity in some of the troops at Craney island, who are charged with having waded into the river, and shot at the unresisting and yielding foe, who clung to the wreck of a boat which had been sunk by the fire of our guns.

Humanity and mercy are inseparable from true courage, and the General knows too well the character of the troops under his command to doubt their magnanimity towards an unresisting foe. It is equally due to the honor of the troops engaged, and to the hitherto unquestioned fame of the American arms, for honor and clemency, that the imputation should be investigated. If the charge be well founded, the army must be purified by punishment for this abomination. If, as the commander hopes and believes, the conduct of our troops has been misconceived, the world should have an authentic record to repel the imputation.

He, therefore, directs that a board of officers, to consist of Colonel Freeman, President, Lieutenant Colonels Boykin, Mason, and Read, do convene the day after to-morrow, at a place to be appointed by the President, for the purpose of investigating these charges, and report accordingly.

JAMES MAURICE,
Major, Act. Ast. Ad. Gen.

The evidence having been gone through, the Board, after deliberate and mature consideration, do pronounce the following opinion:

That it appears, from the testimony adduced, that, on the 22d of last month, in the action at Craney island, two of the enemy's boats, in front of their line, were sunk by the fire of our batteries; the soldiers and sailors who were in those boats were consequently afloat, and in danger of drowning; and being in front of the boats which were uninjured, to disable these, our guns were necessarily fired in a direction of the men in the water, but with no intention whatever to do them further harm, but, on the contrary, orders were given to prevent this by ceasing to fire grape, and only to fire round shot. It also is substantiated, that one of the enemy, who had apparently surrendered, advanced towards the shore, about one hundred yards, when he suddenly turned to his right, and endeavored to make his escape to a body of the enemy who had landed above the island, and who were then in view; then, and not till then, was he fired upon, to bring him back, which had the desired effect, and he was taken unhurt to the island.

It further appears, that the troops on the island exerted themselves in acts of hospitality and kindness to the unresisting and yielding foe.

"Therefore, the Board do, with great satisfaction, declare, as their unbiassed opinion, that the charge alleged against the troops is unsupported, and that the character of the American soldiery, for humanity and magnanimity, has not been committed, but, on the contrary, confirmed."

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Taylor to the Secretary of War, dated

NORFOLK, July 7, 1813.

"The Board of officers convened to examine the charge brought against our troops in the affair at Craney island have made such a report as an American could desire. I enclosed a copy yesterday to the British commander, with a letter, of which a copy is enclosed. The bearer of my despatch was met by a flag, the officer of which received the despatch, and a few hours after returned with an answer, of which a copy is also enclosed. I fear, from the generality of its terms, that little amelioration of the system, hitherto practised, is to be expected; but something is gained by placing the enemy so decidedly in the wrong, that the world cannot doubt to whom is to be ascribed any excesses which hereafter may be committed on either side."

Extract of an official letter, addressed by Major Crutchfield to Governor Barbour, dated

YORK COUNTY, HALF-WAY HOUSE,
June 20, 1813.

"To give you, sir, an idea of the savage-like disposition of the enemy, on their getting possession of the neighborhood, would be but a vain attempt. Although Sir Sidney Beckwith assured me that no uneasiness might be felt in relation to the unfortunate Americans, the fact is, that, on yesterday, there were several dead bodies lying unburied, and the wounded not even assisted into town, although observed to be crawling towards a cold and inhospitable protection. The unfortunate females of Hampton, who could not leave town, were suffered to be abused in the most shameful manner, not only by the venal savage foe, but by the unfortunate and infatuated blacks, who were encouraged by them in their excesses. They pillaged, and encouraged every act of murder and rapine—killing a poor man by the name of Kirby, who had been lying on his bed at the point of death for more than six weeks; shooting his wife in the hip at the same time, and killing his faithful dog while lying under his feet. The murdered Kirby was lying, last night, weltering in his bed."

Extract of a letter from Captain Cooper of the Cavalry, to Charles K. Mallory, Esq., Lieutenant Governor of Virginia.

"I was yesterday in Hampton with my troop; that place having been evacuated in the morning by the British. My blood ran cold at what I saw and heard. The few distressed inhabitants running up in every direction to congratulate us; tears were shedding in every corner. The infamous scoundrels, monsters, destroyed everything but the houses, and (my pen is almost unwilling to describe it) the women were ravished by the abandoned ruffians! Great God! my dear friend, can you figure to yourself our Hampton females seized and treated with violence by those monsters, and not a solitary American arm present to avenge their wrongs? But enough; I can no more of this.

"They have received a reinforcement of two thousand, in all six thousand men; and Norfolk or Richmond is their immediate aim. Protect yourselves from such scenes as we have witnessed. They retired in great confusion, leaving behind three thousand weight of beef, muskets, ammunition, canteens, &c., and some of their men, which we took. It is supposed that they apprehended an immediate attack from six thousand of our men, which caused them to retreat so precipitately. My friend, rest assured of one thing, they cannot conquer Americans; they cannot stand them: if we had had one thousand two hundred men, we should have killed or taken the greater part of them.

From the same to the same, dated

ARMISTEAD'S MILL, NEAR HAMPTON.

July 10, 1813.

"DEAR FRIEND: Your favor of the 7th has just been received through the politeness of Major Crutchfield, who had it forwarded to me at this place. I am surprised to hear that you have among you a man who would endeavor to apologize for the unprecedented villany and brutal conduct of the enemy in Hampton. Be assured of one fact, that that which I informed you of in my last was strictly true.

"You request me to make known to you a few of the distressing particulars, in a way which will force conviction upon the minds of the incredulous. I will attend to it, my friend, that you may be enabled to confound such with positive proofs. At present you must content yourself with the following, and believe it as religiously as any fact beyond denial.

"Mrs. Turnbull was pursued up to her waist in the water, and dragged on shore by ten or twelve of these ruffians, who satiated their brutal desires upon her, after pulling off her clothes, stockings, shoes, &c. This was seen by your nephew Keith, and many others. Another case—a married woman, her name unknown to me, with her infant child in her arms, (the child forcibly dragged from her) shared the same fate. Two young women, well known to many, whose names will not be revealed at this time, suffered in like manner. Doctor Colton, Parson Holson, and Mrs. Hopkins, have informed me of these particulars. Another, in the presence of old Mr. Hope, had her gown, &c. cut off with a sword, and violence offered in his presense, which he endeavored to prevent, but had to quit the room, leaving the unfortunate victim in their possession, who, no doubt, was abused in the same way. Old Mr. Hope himself was stripped naked, pricked with a bayonet in the arm, and slapped in the face; and were I to mention a hundred cases in addition to the above, I do not know that I should exaggerate."

Extract from a report made to Major Crutchfield by Thomas Griffin and Robert Lively, Esqrs. dated

YORK, 4th July, 1813

"Upon reaching Hampton, a scene of desolation and destruction presented itself. The few inhabitants we found in town seemed not yet to have recovered from their alarm: dismay and consternation sat on every countenance: reports had reached us of the violence and uncontrolled fury of the enemy after they obtained possession of the place; their conduct, in some cases, being represented such as would have disgraced the days of Vandalism. Our feelings were much excited, and we deemed it our duty to pursue the inquiry as far as practicable, and are sorry to say, that, from all the information we could procure, from sources too respectable to permit us to doubt, we are compelled to believe that acts of violence have been perpetrated, which have disgraced the age in which we live. The sex, hitherto guarded by the soldier's honor, escaped not the rude assaults of superior force; nor could disease disarm the foe of his ferocity. The apology, that these atrocities were committed by French soldiers attached to the British forces now in our waters, appears to us no justification of those who employed them, believing, as we do, that an officer is, or should be, ever responsible for the conduct of the troops under his command."

To the Editor of the Enquirer.

SIR: Having just returned from Hampton, where I made myself acquainted with all the particulars of British outrage, whilst that place was in their possession, I am requested, by many persons, to communicate, through you, to the public, the information I have given them. I do this with no hope or expectation of satisfying those who required other testimony than Major Crutchfield's or Captain Cooper's. I too well know there are those among us, who will still doubt, or pretend to doubt. But as I believe, this class to be few in number, and insignificant in the public estimation; as I firmly believe that a large majority of all political persuasions are open to conviction, and feelingly alive to their country's wrongs; I cannot withhold from them the facts, whose simple recital will, according to their different temperaments, inflame them with rage, or fill them with horror.

* The former of these gentlemen acted as surgeon to the detachment lately stationed at Hampton, and is a young gentleman of the first respectability. The latter is president of the academy at that place, and stands deservedly high in public estimation. Mrs. Hopkins, also, is a lady of very high respectability, and of the most unquestionable veracity.

My name you are at liberty to give the public, or only to those who may inquire for it, as you think proper. I have reason to believe that those who knew me, whether Federal or Republican, will know and acknowledge that I am incapable of publishing a falsehood; and I aver, that every statement inconsistent with the following, no matter on whose authority it is made, is untrue; in proof of which I solemnly undertake, before the world, to establish every fact contained in it, provided any gentleman will sign his name to a denial of either of them.

I went to Hampton with the determination of inquiring minutely into the truth of reports, which I hoped, for the honor of a soldier's profession, and of human nature, to have found exaggerated. In the investigation, I resolved to depend on the second hand relation of no one, where I could mount to the original source of evidence; but since, in some cases, this was impracticable, I feel it a duty carefully to distinguish the one class from the other.

That the town and country adjacent was given up to the indiscriminate plunder of a licentious soldiery, except, perhaps, the house where the headquarters were fixed, is an undeniable truth. Every article of valuable property was taken from it. In many houses not even a knife, a fork, or plate was left. British officers were seen by Dr. Colton in the act of plundering a Mr. Jones's store. His house, although he remained in town, was rifled, and his medicine thrown into the public street, just opposite where many officers took up their quarters, who must have been eye-witnesses of the scene. The church was pillaged, and the plate belonging to it taken away, although inscribed with the donor's name. The windmills in the neighborhood were stripped of their sails. The closets, private drawers, and trunks of the inhabitants, were broken open, and scarcely anything seemed to be too trifling an object to excite the cupidity of these robbers. Several gentlemen informed me that much of their plunder was brought into the back yard of Mrs. Westwood's house, where Sir Sidney Beckwith and Admiral Cockburn resided. But I had no opportunity of seeing this lady, who, it was said, would testify to the fact. In short, Hampton exhibits a dreary and desolate appearance, which no American can witness unmoved. Doctor Wardlaw and Mr. John G. Smith, of this city, visited it in company with me; and their indignation was equal. They, and every one who saw and heard what I have stated, united in execrating the monsters who perpetrated these enormities; and political distinctions, if any existed, were lost in the nobler feelings of pity for the sufferers, and a generous ardor to avenge their wrongs.

Here it may be necessary to notice a publication I have this moment read in the Alexandria Gazette of the 12th, where, among other things, it is said, on the authority of a "gentleman who was in Hampton the day after the evacuation by the enemy," that it was believed there "that nearly all the plundering was committed by the negroes;" and that he saw many "articles brought to the magistrates which had been secreted in the negro houses." That some plundering may have been committed by the negroes, who, as I was told, were embodied and paraded through the streets, is probable enough; that the expression of such an opinion may have been heard in Hampton is likewise probable; but I do utterly deny, that it is believed there, by any person worthy of credit, that "nearly all the plundering was committed by them." Let the gentleman, then, who gives this account, state from whom he derived his information. Let him give the names of the magistrates who received the plunder thus found, and his own; and let him declare what were the main articles he saw brought in. I will not directly hazard the assertion, but I am very much inclined to believe, there were no magistrates in the town at the time spoken of, unless Parson Holson, Dr. Colton, or Captain Willis, are magistrates; and with all these gentlemen I conversed, and heard not a whisper countenancing the statement in the Alexandria paper. How it is known that the negroes "had the address," first to impose on the British commanders, and then on the American troops, which "induced them to retreat to York," and leave Hampton to be plundered by these artful rogues, that gentleman is left to say; but that the American troops did not retire to York, in consequence of such information, is undoubtedly true. Nor is it less true that Captain Cooper's troop arrived in time to prevent any plundering of the least consequence, after the evacuation; and in time to prevent, what many gentlemen there believed to have been a plan concerted between the black and white allies—the firing of the town.

That "Admiral Warren expressed his regret that the inhabitants of Hampton had not all remained, as in that case no plundering would have happened, is probable enough; and is conformable with the answer given to Captain Willis, who complained to Cockburn and Beckwith of the destruction of his private property. "Why did you quit your house?" said these honorable men. "I remained in my house," answered Doctor Colton, "and have found no better treatment."

That Kirby, who, for seven weeks or more, had been confined to his bed, and whose death the savages only a little hastened, was shot in the arms of his wife, is not denied. Those who wish for further confirmation may go and take him from his grave, and weep, if they can feel for an American citizen, over his mangled body. They may go to his wounded wife, and hear her heart-rending tale, and then they may turn to the account of the gentleman, and derive consolation from the excuse (which I never heard) "that it was done in revenge for the refusal of the militia to give quarter to some Frenchmen, who were on board a barge that was sunk by our troops, who continued to fire on the almost drowning men, when making for the shore." This vile slander on our troops will, I have no doubt, be met, in the proper manner, by the gallant officer who commands them at Norfolk. But the worst is to come.

I conversed with a lady whose name is mentioned in Captain Cooper's letter, in company with Parson Holson, Doctor Colton, and Captain Willis. Her story was too shocking in its details to meet the public eye. When I had convinced her of the object I had in view in visiting her—that it was dictated by no impertinent curiosity, but a desire to know the whole truth, to enable me, on the one hand, to do justice even to an enemy, or, on the other, to electrify my countrymen with the recital of her sufferings, she discovered everything which her convulsive struggles between shame and desire to expose her brutal assailants would permit. This woman was seized by five or six ruffians, some of them dressed in red and speaking correctly the English language, and stripped naked. Her cries and her prayers were disregarded, and her body became the subject of the most abominable indecencies. She at one time made her escape, and ran into a creek hard by, followed by a young daughter; whence she was dragged by the monsters in human shape, to experience new and aggravated suffering. In this situation she was kept the whole night, whilst her screams were heard at intervals by some of the Americans in town, who could only clasp their hands in hopeless agony.

Virginian! American! Friend or enemy of the administration, or of the war! go, as I have done, to this woman's house and hear and see her. See too her young daughter on the bed of sickness, in consequence of the abuses of that night! and your heart, if it be made of "penetrable stuff" will throb with indignation, and a thirst for revenge, and your hand instinctively grasp the weapon for inflicting it.

A Mrs. Briggs related to us, that a woman who had come to Hampton, to visit her husband, who was in the militia, was taken forcibly from her side by four soldiers in green, and with her young child, which one of them snatched from her arms, borne to the hospital, in spite of her screams. They had previously robbed them of their rings, and attempted to tear open their bosoms. A Mrs. Hopkins, who was not in town when I was there, obtained the assistance of an officer, and rescued the woman from her ravishers, but not until one of them had gratified his abominable desires. I was told by the gentleman who accompanied me, that Mrs. Hopkins confirmed this statement, and would swear to at least two other cases of a similar kind, without, however, giving up the names of the young and respectable women who suffered.

Doctor Colton and Captain Mills, assisted by an officer, rescued another lady from the greatest of all calamities.

Old Mr. Hope, aged, as he told Major Crutchfield, (in my presence) sixty-four or five years, was seized by these wretches and stripped of all his clothing, even of his shoes and his shirt. A bayonet was run a little way into his arm behind, as if in cruel sport; while several were held to his breast. In this situation he was kept for a considerable time, and would probably have been another victim of their rage, if their attention had not been diverted to a woman, who had sought refuge in his house. They followed her into the kitchen, whither she had run for safety. Mr. Hope made off amidst her agonizing screams, and when he returned to his house, he was told by his domestics that their horrid purposes were accomplished. This I had from him.

How far this violation extended will never be known. Women will not publish what they consider their own shame, and the men in town were carefully watched and guarded. But enough is known to induce the belief of the existence of many other cases, and enough to fire every manly bosom with the irrepressible desire of revenge.

I am not disposed to tire the public patience, or I could tell of enormities little inferior to the above. But the enemy are convicted of robbery, rape, and murder, and it is unnecessary to add to the catalogue of their crimes.

Men of Virginia! will you permit all this? Fathers, and brothers, and husbands, will you fold your arms in apathy, and only curse your despoilers? No, you will fly with generous emulation to the unfurled standard of your country. You will imitate the example of those generous spirits who are, even now, in crowds, tendering their services to the Commander-in-Chief; who are pouring from their native mountains, and soliciting to be led against the enemy wherever he dares to show his face. You will prove yourselves worthy of the immortal honor that the enemy has conferred upon you in selecting you as the object of his vengeance. You will neglect, for a time, all civil pursuits and occupations, and devote yourselves to the art, a knowledge of which the enemy has made necessary. You will learn to command; and, with "Hampton" as your watch-word—to conquer.

YORK, July 4, 1814.

SIR: Anxious to effect, as early as possible, the objects of the flag intrusted to us by you on the 1st instant, we proceeded, immediately after receiving your despatches for Admiral Warren and General Taylor, to Hampton. On our arrival at the latter place, some difficulty arose in procuring a vessel to convey us to the British fleet; and after some delay, we were compelled to embark in a small, open, four-oared boat, the only one, it seemed, which the fury of the enemy had left capable of floating. We proceeded to the fleet of the enemy with the utmost despatch which our little skiff, and the excessive heat of the day, would permit; and when distant from the Admiral's ship about a half mile, were met and hailed by a barge of the enemy, the officer of which was informed we had despatches for Admiral Warren. We were invited into the barge, which invitation was accepted, as well to relieve ourselves from the confinement on board our little vessel, to lighten as much as possible the burden of our oarsmen, and proceed with as much expedition as practicable to obtain the objects of our mission. On our arrival at the Admiral's ship (the San Domingo) we were directed to proceed to the "Sceptre," a line of battle ship, on which we were informed Admiral Cockburn had recently hoisted his flag. Arriving alongside of this ship we were desired by the officer of the barge to ascend the ship. Upon our reaching the deck, we found a large assemblage of officers—certainly a greater number than could be necessarily attached to a single ship. In the space of ten minutes the two Admirals, Warren and Cockburn, approached; to the former, we delivered your despatches, who, upon perusal, evinced embarrassment, and after a short pause, said, that the principal object of the flag appeared to be to procure supplies for your hospital. He was answered in the affirmative. Could not these supplies have been as easily and early procured from Richmond as from Norfolk? We thought not. The Admiral then said he would reflect upon the subject, and return us an answer soon, and retired with Admiral Cockburn to the cabin of the ship.

A period of about fifteen minutes then elapsed, when Admiral Cockburn advanced, and addressing Major Griffin, informed him, that the Admiral would see him in the cabin. Upon Major Griffin's reaching the cabin, the two Admirals only with him, Admiral Warren again repeated the opinion, that the hospital supplies could be as expeditiously procured from Richmond, as from Norfolk, saying, it was contrary to their regulations to permit even a flag to go to Norfolk; that it was their intention to land Mr. King, who went with the flag, at Seawall's point, and jointly with Admiral Cockburn, expressed an unwillingness to permit the flag to proceed. They were answered, that if the flag was permitted to proceed, the supplies could be procured sooner than if the flag was compelled to return, certainly in the course of the following day; that if compelled to resort to Richmond, three days, probably more, would pass before the stores could reach Hampton; that our wounded and sick were suffering for medicines and necessaries; that all the medicine, private as well as public property, had been wantonly destroyed by the troops who lately captured Hampton; and that the supplies absolutely required for the use of the hospital could not be procured in Hampton. The Admiral said he had heard that the hospitals had received some supplies. He was asked from whence, and assured it was not the case. Finding the Admiral still hesitating, Major Griffin said, "that the reputed humanity of Admiral Warren forbid Major Crutchfield to doubt that the application for the passage of a flag to Norfolk would be refused." After a short pause Major Griffin was informed that the flag might proceed, upon condition of returning along-side the ship, in the same vessel, with the same persons, and with no increase of persons. The restriction to the same vessel was combatted, on the ground that, in the event of much wind, the boat was too small to navigate the roads, and thus the object of the flag would be defeated. But finding no relaxation in the condition probable, it was determined, upon consultation with Lieutenant Lively, to proceed. Upon the subject of prisoners, Admiral Warren acknowledged one only to be in the fleet, taken at Hampton. He declined all arrangement, and avoided all discussion on this topic, saying he had opened a correspondence with General Taylor, but nothing was decided. Relative to the officers' baggage captured in Hampton, the Admiral said that such articles as had been found had been restored, and mentioned the papers of Captain Pryor, which had been placed in the care of Captain Myers of Norfolk, and assured Major Griffin that he would direct Sir Sidney Beckwith to inquire farther, and if they should be discovered it would be made known to us on our return. We were then informed we might proceed, which we immediately did, and reaching Norfolk after 3 P. M. repaired to General Taylor's quarters, who directed the supplies written for by the surgeons. Returning on the second, we were, as customary, again met by a barge of the enemy, and desired to call on board the Admiral's ship; we entered the ship with the officers of the barge, and were received by the Captain, who inquired if we had despatches from the Admiral. Being informed we were the returning flag that had proceeded to Norfolk the day before, the Captain retired to the cabin, and shortly returned with information that we might proceed when we pleased; this we did, and deposited with Doctor Colton the medical and hospital supplies sent from Norfolk.

Upon our reaching Hampton a scene of desolation and destruction presented itself. The few inhabitants we found in town seemed not yet to have recovered from their alarm; dismay and consternation sat on every countenance. Reports had reached us of the violence and uncontrolled fury of the enemy after they obtained possession of the place; their conduct, in some cases, being represented such as would have disgraced the days of Vandalism. The sex, hitherto guarded by the soldier's honor, escaped not the rude assaults of superior force; nor could disease disarm the foe of his ferocity. Addenda.

WASHINGTON CITY, July 30, 1813.

From William Berry, Midshipmen in the Frigate Chesapeake.

SIR: I consider myself bound to lay before you what came under my knowledge while on board the Chesapeake, as well as on board the Shannon.

After the enemy had complete possession of the ship, Midshipmen Randolph and Flushman were ordered from the fore and main top. In coming down the shrouds Lieutenant Faulkner (the British officer) said to his men, kill those damned rascals. Then, and immediately, several muskets were discharged at them, but without effect. My station was in the mizzen top, where I had an opportunity of seeing their actions. I was looking on deck when I saw one of the Chesapeake's men crawling along, attempting to get below, with one of his legs off. One of the enemy stepped up to him with his cutlass, and immediately put an end to his existence. Lieutenant Faulkner looked up in the mizzen top; pointing at me, said he to his men, go up three of you and throw that damned Yankee overboard. They immediately rushed up seizing me by the collar; now, said they, you damned Yankee, you shall swim for it, attempting to throw me overboard; but I got within the rigging, when one of them kicked me in the breast, which was the cause of my falling; being stunned by the fall, I lay some time senseless, and when I came to, I was cut over the head with a cutlass, which nearly terminated my existence. Eleven of our midshipmen were confined in a small place, nine feet by six, with an old sail to lay on, and a guard at the door, until a day or two before our arrival at Halifax; and, likewise, eleven of us upon five rations, and some days only one meal. Our clothes were taken on board of the Shannon; Lieutenant Wallis, the commanding officer on board, would not let us take our clothes below with us, but pledged his word and honor as an officer, we should receive our clothes. But we discovered, next morning, that their midshipmen had on our clothes and side arms. We were conversing together respecting our clothes—one of their midshipmen overheard our conversation, and made a report to the Lieutenant commanding. He then sent word to us that if we said anything more about the clothes, he would put us in the fore-hold with the men. We expected to receive our clothes when we arrived in port, but, I assure you, sir, nothing was ever restored. Other rascally things occurred, which our officers will, when they return, make known to the public, disgraceful to a civilized nation. If your request could have been made sooner, I should have felt gratified in making a fuller statement. I have, &c.

WILLIAM BERRY.

Hon. L. CONDUCT, Washington.

Another circumstance took place on board, which entirely escaped my memory until this moment. Several of the officers had money taken from them which they had received from the Chesapeake as prize money. Mr. Higginbotham, as nearly as I can recollect, had upwards of one hundred and thirty dollars.

W. BERRY.

GEORGETOWN, July 30, 1813.

SIR: Having perused a letter of yours to Mr. Berry, requesting information respecting the treatment of the American officers and seamen of the late Chesapeake, I consider myself bound, sir, to lay before you what came under my knowledge. My having been wounded, and remaining on board the Chesapeake, might not give me that scope for observation which others possessed; but, I am sorry to say, many things transpired disgraceful to the character of a brave enemy. Whilst undressing myself in the steerage, after the Americans were driven below or had surrendered, and after resistance had ceased, I believe entirely, several muskets and pistols were at once pointed down the hatchway, and discharged in the direction of the cockpit; and as the steerage and cockpit were filled with the wounded, in all probability some were killed outright. It was Midshipman Hopewell, and not Livingston, who was so inhumanly treated, as described in the public prints. It has been the custom in our navy to take the side-arms of officers, (prisoners,) but to restore them on their leaving the ship. Ours were taken, worn, and never restored, together with what nautical instruments they could lay their hands on. When spoken to by the American officers on the subject, the answer was, such things were free plunder. A day or two after the action, I was conversing with Lieutenant Budd and Mr. Nicholls, near the taffarel, respecting the engagement, when it was observed some of the Shannon's men were listening to our conversation. Immediately after, Lieutenant Faulkner, the commanding officer, ordered sentinels to be placed at the mizen mast; and, said he to them, if you see any of the Chesapeake's men abaft the mizen mast, cut them down; if you see them conversing together, cut them down without hesitation. It will be remembered the three officers who caused this order were all severely wounded. We received no caution and overheard it by accident. So great was the rage for plunder, that Captain Lawrence, before his death, could not obtain a bottle of wine from his private sea stores, without a note from the doctor to the Lieutenant commanding. I pass over the robbing of the midshipmen on board the Shannon, as it did not come under my immediate notice. If your request could have been made earlier, I should have felt gratified in making a fuller statement.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect,
 your obedient servant,

WM. A. WEAVER.

*Additional Fortifications—Increase of the Army.ADDITIONAL FORTIFICATIONS, AND AN INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

[Communicated to the Senate, August 1, 1813.]

COMMITTEE CHAMBER,
Monday, May 30, 1813.

SIR: I am directed by the committee of the Senate to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President as relates to the Military Establishment, to inquire of you what provision has been made, by your Department, for the protection and defence of the seaboard of the United States; whether the protection authorized by law is deemed sufficient; if not, what further or other provision is considered necessary; whether any, and if any, what, modification of the Military Establishment, or extension thereof, is deemed expedient. I am also directed to ask you to give the committee such information, in relation to any other specific objects in your Department, as you may deem proper to be communicated, or which may require legislative provision.

Accept assurances of my high respect.

J. ANDERSON, Chairman.

To the SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 10, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, written by direction of the Committee of the Senate "to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President as relates to the Military Establishment," and inquiring

What provision had been made by the War Department for the protection of the seaboard?

Whether the protection authorized by law be deemed sufficient? And, if not, what further or other provision be considered necessary?

Whether any, and, if any, what modification or extension of the Military Establishment be deemed expedient; and

What other specific objects within my Department may require legislative provision?

To these questions I beg leave to reply:

1st. That, so far as the defence of the seaboard depends on troops, the statement I had the honor to make to you yesterday will be found to contain an appropriate answer to the first question. It but remains, therefore, to present a table of the posts, the number and caliber of the cannon, and of the quantity of ammunition at each of these. This will be found in the documents enclosed, numbered 1, 2, 3.*

2d. That, in my opinion, the present protection of the seaboard is not sufficient, and that the measures to be taken for its better defence are of two kinds—additional fortifications, and an increased number of regular troops.

Under the former of these heads, it is proposed to erect a work, of earth, or of more durable materials, if found advisable, on a small island of the Delaware, called the Pea Patch. The plan and extent of the work will be adapted to the relation which the island bears to the shores and channel of the Delaware; and, from the survey made, it is believed that the work will completely cover both. The situation of the island is eight miles below New Castle.

A work of the same description at Hawkins's Point, near Baltimore.

A work on Maryland Point, or on that called Cedar Shoal Point, on the Potomac. It cannot be doubted but that the seat of the National Government should be placed, not merely beyond injury, but beyond disturbance, from an enemy.

A work on Craney island, for the better protection of Norfolk, has been commenced, and is mentioned here but from a belief that the importance of the position will be found to justify an extension of the present plan.

At Charleston, or its dependencies, some covering works have been projected, but a want of funds has hitherto prevented their execution.

Savannah is believed to be a position which, from various causes, is more exposed than any other, and upon the defence of which, few expenditures of public money have been made. It is, therefore, proposed to protect it by a chain of redans on three of its sides, and, on the fourth, which is understood to be the most vulnerable, by a few redoubts, connected by a ditch and parapet, &c.

No additional work at New Orleans is thought necessary. One, of regular form and of considerable extent, has been recently erected on the eastern bank of the Mississippi, at the Detour Anglais, and a second has been projected for commanding the entrance from the sea into Lake Pontchartrain. When these are finished, the defence of New Orleans from exterior attacks, and by means of fixed batteries, may be considered as complete.

Under the second general provision, (an increased number of regular troops,) I offer the following arrangement of permanent garrisons, viz:

To districts No. 1 and 2	-	-	2,000 men.
To do. do. 3 and 4	-	-	3,000
To do. do. 5	-	-	3,000
To do. do. 6	-	-	2,000
To do. do. 7	-	-	3,000

3d. In fulfilling the arrangement stated in the preceding article, it will be necessary to organize the whole number of the twenty regiments authorized to be raised during the last session of Congress. Of these regiments fifteen have been already set on foot, including ten companies of rangers, intended for the defence of the Territories of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. It is respectfully proposed that the remaining five be also raised expressly for the defence of other and particular points, and that their service be made commensurate with the war. Corps of this description may be promptly obtained, and made to take a very efficient character. This is the only modification of the present Military Establishment which is believed to be necessary. An extension of it, called for as well by justice as by policy, is the establishment of an invalid corps.

* Not on file.

Additional Fortifications—Increase of the Army.

Instances of partial decrepitude have been much multiplied by the events of the last and present campaigns, and can best be relieved by an establishment which but demands from the sufferer a service proportioned to his physical ability, and which, while it gives occupation, guaranties against want.

4th. Some minor and insulated subjects require legislative notice and provision.

1. The law creating the Ordnance department provides for four deputy commissaries. It is proposed to authorize the President to add five other deputies. This will enable the head of that department to assign to each military district one deputy, who shall establish and superintend a laboratory within the same, and thus do away the expense and risk of transmitting fixed ammunition from one district to another.

2. Aids-de-camp are now taken from the line of the army in all cases, as are assistant adjutants and inspectors general, and, in many cases, their principals; and, also, the paymasters of districts. These multiplied draughts upon the line are found to have a bad effect, and the more so, as officers of the greatest intelligence are generally elected to fill these appointments. It is, therefore proposed that general officers be permitted to select their aids from the mass of citizens, and that the rank, pay, and emoluments, of a captain of cavalry be given to each aid-de-camp, so long as he be continued as such.

3. No provision is made by law for paying money to officers of light dragoons and light artillery, in lieu of forage, when not drawn in kind.

4. The provisions of the act of the 6th of July, 1812, in relation to the price to be allowed in lieu of forage not drawn in kind, by officers of certain grades, appear to be contradictory.

5. The United States possess, in fee simple, sundry lots of ground in Pittsburg. It is understood that, if these were divided into smaller lots, and sold at public sale, they would bring not less than forty thousand dollars—a sum which would be competent to establish a laboratory near that place, on a scale proportioned to all the demands of the West, Southwest, and Northwest. A law will be necessary to make such sale.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 18, 1813.

SIR: The following report, additional to that made on the 10th instant, on the subject of an increased seaboard defence, is respectfully submitted to the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the Military Establishment.

Our Atlantic towns and cities furnish, respectively, a large number of seafaring men, who, from their hardihood and habits of life, might be very usefully employed in the defence of the seaboard, particularly in the management of great guns, whether in fixed or in floating batteries, or in those of position. A corps of great efficiency might be formed out of these men, and on terms much more economical than those necessary to obtain soldiers of the line.

Their term of service need not exceed eight months in each year, viz: from the month of March to that of December. They may be had at the rate of twelve dollars per month, (if subsisted,) and without expense on account of clothing.

1,000 sea fencibles, at $12 per month, each, is per month - - - - - $12,000

8 months, at $12,000 per month, is - 96,000

Subsistence for term aforesaid, is - 36,000

Pay and subsistence of officers, viz:

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 12, 1813.

SIR: In reply to the inquiry of the honorable the Senate, viz: "What preparations have been made, and are now in readiness, for the defence of the navy yard and other public property in the City of Washington, in case it should be assailed by the enemy?" I have the honor to report that, on the water line, the means of defence are of two kinds, naval and military; that there are of the former, one frigate, two schooners, and three gunboats, so stationed as to co-operate with Fort Washington; that this fort and its covering work have been recently put into a state of thorough repair, are well equipped with heavy cannon, furnaces, &c., and are now occupied by a competent garrison of United States' artilleryists; that, to any attempts on the land side, we can oppose the 10th, 36th, 38th, and a detachment from the 5th, regiments of infantry, and one battalion of militia; the whole amounting to one thousand six hundred effectives. That the navy yard and marine establishment can furnish an additional defence of nearly one battalion; that two companies of light artillery have been organized, under an officer of much experience, and are supplied with cannon, caissons, &c.; that several uniformed corps are in weekly drill, and ready for service the moment that a call upon them shall become necessary; that, within the District alone, we may count on an additional force of nearly twelve hundred effective militia, and that a competent supply of arms, and of fixed and loose ammunition, has been placed within their reach.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

CHAIRMAN MILITARY COMMITTEE, &c.

Failure of the Northern Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 26, 1813.

SIR: I beg leave to submit to the consideration of the Military Committee of the Senate, a copy of a letter from Commodore Chauncey to the Secretary of the Navy, having relation to the subject submitted in my letter of the 19th inst. Mr. Stacey has been discharged, on the ground that a citizen cannot be considered as a spy.

I have, &c.

J. ARMSTRONG.

Hon. Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman, &c.

U. S. SHIP MADISON,

Sackett's Harbor, July 4, 1813.

SIR: On the 1st instant I caused Mr. Samuel Stacey to be apprehended as a spy. Mr. Stacey lives upon the St. Lawrence, a few miles below Ogdensburg, and I have the most positive information that he has been in the habit of conveying information to the enemy for many months. He visited this place a few days before the British made the attack on the 29th of May, and I have no doubt but that he is the person that gave the information that most of the troops had been sent to Niagara. I had information from the person that I employ, on the other side, that this man would visit the harbor about the last of June. He was accordingly watched. When he left Ogdensburg, he said he was going to Utica upon important business. He told others that he was going into the Western country to collect money, instead of which he came to the harbor, without any ostensible business, and made a great many inquiries respecting the fleet: when they would sail? and the force of the new ship? &c. I, therefore, thought it my duty to detain this man for trial. I can prove his frequent intercourse with the enemy. At any rate I shall deprive the enemy of the information which he could have conveyed to him, which is all important at this time.

It would be very desirable to hang this traitor to his country, as he is considered respectable in the country in which he lives, and I think that it is full time to make an example of some of our countrymen, who are so base and degenerate as to betray their country by becoming the spies and informers of our enemy. I hope the steps which I have taken with respect to Mr. Stacey will meet with your approbation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

Hon. W. JONES, *Secretary of the Navy.*CAUSES OF THE FAILURE OF THE ARMY
ON THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.

[Communicated to the House, February 2, 1814.]
To the House of Representatives of the United States.

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of War, complying with their resolution of the 31st of December last.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 31st, 1814.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Jan. 25, 1814.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st of December last, requesting such information (not improper to be communicated) as may tend to explain the causes of the failure of the arms of the United States on the Northern frontier, I have the honor to submit the following documents, and to offer to you, sir, the assurance of the very high respect with which I am,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,
JOHN ARMSTRONG.

The PRESIDENT.

Correspondence between the Secretary of War and Major General Dearborn, &c.

Note presented to the Cabinet, on the 8th February, 1813, by the Secretary of War.

The enemy's force at Montreal and its dependencies has been stated at 16,000 effectives. It more probably does not exceed 10 or 12,000. The militia part of it may amount to one sixth of the whole. Is it probable that we shall be able to open the campaign on Lake Champlain, with a force competent to meet and dislodge this army before the 15th of May? I put the question on this date, because it is not to be doubted but that the enemy will then be reinforced, and, of course, that new relations, in point of strength, will be established between us. Our present regular force, on both sides of Lake Champlain, does not exceed 2,400 men. The addition made to it must, necessarily, consist of recruits, who, for a time, will not be better than militia; and when we consider that the recruiting service is but beginning, and that we now approach the middle of February, the conclusion is, I think, safe, that we cannot move in this direction, and thus early, (say 1st of May,) with effect.

It then remains to choose between a course of entire inaction, because incompetent to the main attack, or one having a secondary, but still an important object; such would be the reduction of that part of Upper Canada lying between the town of Prescott, on the St. Lawrence and Lake Erie, including the towns of Kingston and York, and the Forts George and Erie.

On this line of frontier the enemy have,
At Prescott - - - - - 300
At Kingston - - - - - 600
At George and Erie, &c. - - - - 1,200

Making a total (of regular troops) of 2,100

Kingston and Prescott, and the destruction of the British ships at the former, would present the first object; York, and the frigates said to be building there, the second; George and Erie, the third.

The force to be employed on this service should not be less than 6,000 effective regular troops, because, in this first enterprise of a second campaign, nothing must, if possible, be left to chance.

The time for giving execution to this plan is clearly indicated by the following facts:

Failure of the Northern Army.

1st. The river St. Lawrence is not open to the purposes of navigation before the 15th of May; and

2d. Lake Ontario is free from all obstruction, arising from ice, by the 1st day of April.

Under these circumstances we shall have six weeks for the expedition before it be possible for Sir George Prevost to give it any disturbance.

Should this outline be approved, the details for the service can be made and expedited in forty-eight hours.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Dearborn, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 10, 1813.

"I have the President's orders to communicate to you, as expeditiously as possible, the outline of a campaign, which you will immediately institute and pursue against Upper Canada.

"1st. 4,000 troops will be assembled at Sackett's Harbor.

"2d. 3,000 will be brought together at Buffalo, and its vicinity.

"3d. The former of these corps will be embarked and transported, under convoy of the fleet, to Kingston, where they will be landed. Kingston, its garrison, and the British ships wintering in the harbor of that place, will be its first object. Its second object will be York, (the capital of Upper Canada,) the stores collected, and the two frigates building there. Its third object, Forts George and Erie, and their dependencies. In the attainment of this last there will be a co-operation between the two corps. The composition of these will be as follows:

1st. Bloomfield's brigade	-	-	1,436
2d. Chandler's do.	-	-	1,044
3d. Philadelphia detachment	-	-	400
4th. Baltimore do.	-	-	300
5th. Carlisle do.	-	-	200
6th. Greenbush do.	-	-	400
7th. Sackett's Harbor do.	-	-	250

4,030

8th. Several corps at Buffalo, under the command of Col. Porter, and the recruits belonging thereto	-	-	3,000
---	---	---	-------

Total - - - 7,030

"The time for executing the enterprise will be governed by the opening of Lake Ontario, which usually takes place about the first of April.

"The Adjutant General has orders to put the more Southern detachments in march as expeditiously as possible. The two brigades on Lake Champlain you will move so as to give them full time to reach their place of destination by the 25th of March. The route by Elizabeth will, I think, be the shortest and best. They will be replaced by some new raised regiments from the East.

"You will put into your movements as much privacy as may be compatible with their execution. They may be masked by reports that Sack-ett's Harbor is in danger, and that the principal effort will be made on the Niagara, in co-operation with General Harrison. As the route to Sackett's Harbor, and to Niagara, is, for a considerable distance, the same, it may be well to intimate, even in orders, that the latter is the destination of the two brigades now at Lake Champlain."

ALBANY, February 18, 1813.

SIR: Your despatches of the 10th were received last evening. Nothing shall be omitted, on my part, in endeavoring to carry into effect the expedition proposed.

I fear the very large magazines of provisions on Lake Champlain will be unsafe, unless a considerable part is removed at some distance from the store, or considerable force is assembled at Burlington, and vicinity, by the time the two brigades shall move. Another motive for having a large force on that lake will be, that of preventing the enemy from sending almost his whole force from Lower Canada to Kingston, as soon as our intentions shall be so far known as to afford satisfactory evidence of our intentions in relation to the conquest of Upper Canada; and unless an imposing force shall menace Lower Canada, the enemy's whole force may be concentrated in Upper Canada, and require as large a force to operate against them as would be necessary to operate towards Montreal. It may be advisable to draw out a body of New Hampshire militia to serve, for a short time, in Vermont. You will judge of the expediency of such a measure; but I do not believe that there will be a sufficient body of new raised troops in season for taking the place of the two brigades.

I this day received a letter from Colonel Porter, in which he informs me that General Winchester had arrived at Niagara, with such of his troops as had escaped the tomahawk, and that they were crossing over on parole. He states that, at the close of the action, all those who, by wounds or other causes, were unable to march, were indiscriminately put to death. Such outrageous conduct will require serious attention, especially when British troops are concerned in the action.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 24, 1813.

SIR: Before I left New York, and till very recently since my arrival here, I was informed, through various channels, that a Winter or Spring attack upon Kingston was not practicable, on account of the snow which generally lays to the depth of two, and sometimes three feet, over all that Northern region during those seasons. Hence it is, that in the plan recently communicated, it was thought safest and best to make the attack by a combination of naval and military means, and to approach our object, not by directly crossing the St. Lawrence on the ice, but by setting out from Sackett's Harbor, in concert with, and under convoy of, the fleet. Later information differs from that on which this plan was founded; and the fortunate issue of Major Forsyth's last expedition shows that small enterprises, at least, may be successfully executed at the present season. The advice given in your letter of the — instant, has a bearing also on the same point and to the same effect. If the enemy be really weak at Kingston, and approachable by land and ice, Pike (who will be a brigadier in a day or two) may be put into motion from Lake Champlain, by the Chateaugue route, (in sleighs) and, with the two bridges, cross the St. Lawrence where it may be thought best, destroy the armed ships, and seize and hold Kingston, until you can join him with the other corps destined for the future objects of the expedition; and, if pressed by Prevost, before such junction can be effected, he may withdraw himself to Sackett's Harbor, or other place of security on our side of the line. This would be much the shorter road to the object, and perhaps the safer one, as the St. Lawrence is now every where well bridged, and offers no obstruction to either attack or retreat. Such a movement will, no doubt, be soon known to Prevost, and cannot but disquiet him. The dilemma it presents will be serious. Either he must give up his western posts, or, to save them, he must carry himself in force, and promptly, to Upper Canada. In the latter case, he will be embarrassed for subsistence. His convoys of provision will be open to our attacks, on a line of nearly one hundred miles, and his position at Montreal much weakened. Another decided advantage will be, to let us into the secret of his real strength. If he be able to make heavy detachments to cover, or to recover Kingston, and to protect his supplies, and after all, maintain himself at Montreal and on Lake Champlain, he is stronger than I imagined, or than any well authenticated reports make him to be.

With regard to our magazines, my belief is, that we have nothing to fear; because, as stated above, Prevost's attention must be given to the Western posts, and to our movements against them. He will not dare to advance Southwardly while a heavy corps is operating on his flank, and menacing his line of communication. But, on the other supposition, they (the magazines) may be easily secured; first, by taking them to Willsborough; or, second, to Burlington; or, third, by a militia call, to protect them where they are. Orders are given for the march of the Eastern volunteers, excepting Ulmer's regiment and two companies of axe-men, sent to open the route to the Chaudiere.

The Southern detachments will be much stronger than I had supposed; that from Philadelphia will mount up nearly to 1,000 effectives.

With great respect, dear General, I am, &c.,
JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Gen. DEARBORN.

HEADQUARTERS, ALBANY, Feb. 25, '14.

SIR: I this day received, by express, from Col. Macomb, the enclosed account from Major Forsyth. His known zeal for a small partisan warfare has induced me to give him repeated caution against such measures, on his part, as would probably produce such retaliating strokes as he would be unable to resist; but I fear my advice has not been as fully attended to as could have been wished. He is an excellent officer, and, under suitable circumstances, would be of important service.

I have requested the Governor to order General Brown out with three or four hundred of such militia as he can soonest assemble to join Forsyth; and I have ordered Colonel Pike, with four hundred of his command, to proceed, in sleighs, by what is considered the shortest and best route, to the neighborhood of Ogdensburg, or to Sackett's Harbor. On his arrival at Pottsdam, or Canton, or Russel, he will be able to communicate with Brown or Forsyth, or both, and act with them as circumstances may require.

The affair at Ogdensburg will be a fair excuse for moving troops in that direction; and, by this movement, it will be ascertained whether the same route will be the best in future; the distance by that route from Plattsburg to Sackett's Harbor is but little more than one-half of what it would be by the route proposed, and I am assured by a gentleman whom I can confide in, that there will be no difficulty by that route.

Chauncey has not returned from New York. I am satisfied that, if he had arrived as soon as I had expected him, we might have made a stroke at Kingston on the ice; but his presence was necessary for having the aid of the seamen and marines.

From a letter received this day from Colonel Porter, at Niagara, it appears that the enemy were preparing to strike at Black Rock. I can give him no assistance.

I am, sir, with respect and esteem, your obedient humble servant,
H. DEARBORN
Hon J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

FEBRUARY 22, 1813.

SIR: I have only time to inform that the enemy, with a very superior force, succeeded in taking Ogdensburg this morning about nine o'clock. They had about two men to our one, exclusive of Indians. Numbers of the enemy are dead on the field. Not more than twenty of our men killed and wounded; Lieutenant Beard is among the latter.

I have made a saving retreat of about eight or nine miles. I could not get all the wounded off.

We have killed two of the enemy to one of ours killed by them. We want ammunition and some provisions sent on to us, also sleighs for the wounded.

If you can send me three hundred men all shall be retaken, and Prescott too, or I will lose my life in the attempt. I shall write you more particularly to-day. Yours, with due respect,

BENJAMIN FORSYTH,
Capt. Rifle Reg., Commanding.

Col. MACOMB, Sackett's Harbor.

Failure of the Northern Army.

Extract of a letter from General Dearborn to the Secretary of War, dated

ALBANY, February 26, 1813.

"Having received information that Sir George Prevost was moving towards Upper Canada, with considerable force, but not such as can be fully relied on, I have, however, ordered four hundred more of Pike's command to follow the first detachment without delay."

HEADQUARTERS, SACKETT'S HARBOR,
March 3, 1813.

SIR: Having been informed that Sir George Prevost had adjourned the Legislature at Quebec, assigning as the motive that His Majesty's service required his presence in Upper Canada, and having received certain information of his passing Montreal and having arrived at Kingston, I set out immediately for this place, having ordered the force at Greenbush, and part of Colonel Pike's command, in sleighs, for this place. I arrived here in fifty-two hours. I am now satisfied, from such information as is entitled to full credit, that a force has been collected from Quebec, Montreal, and Upper Canada, of from six to eight thousand men, at Kingston, and that we may expect an attack within forty-eight hours, and perhaps sooner.

The militia have been called in, and every effort will, I trust, be made to defend the post; but I fear neither the troops from Greenbush nor Plattsburg will arrive in season to afford their aid. I have sent expresses to have them hurried on.

Commodore Chauncey has not arrived; he will be here to-morrow. The armed vessels have not been placed in the positions intended by the Commodore.

Our total force may be estimated at nearly three thousand of all descriptions.

Sir George Prevost is represented to be determined to effect his object at all events, and will undoubtedly make every effort in his power for the purpose.

We shall, I trust, give him a warm reception; but, if his force is such as is expected, and should make an attack before our troops arrive from Greenbush and Plattsburg at Sackett's Harbor, the result may at least be doubtful.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

Hon. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, March 9, 1813.

SIR: I have not yet had the honor of a visit from Sir George Prevost. His whole force is concentrated at Kingston, probably amounting to six or seven thousand; about three thousand of them regular troops. The ice is good, and we expect him every day; and every measure for preventing a surprise is in constant activity. The troops from Greenbush (upwards of 400) have arrived. I have heard nothing from Pike; he should have been here yesterday. I have sent three expresses to meet him; neither has returned. I have suspicions of the express employed by the Quartermaster General to convey the orders to Pike; the earliest measures were taken for conveying a duplicate of his orders. I hope to hear from him to-day. His arrival, with eight hundred good troops, would be very important at this time. The enemy are apprized of his movement.

I begin to entertain some doubts whether Sir George will venture to attack us, but shall not relax in being prepared to give him a decent reception.

I should feel easier if Pike should arrive in season. I am in want of officers of experience. My whole force, exclusive of seamen and marines, who will be confined to the vessels, and have no share in the action, until my force shall be worsted, amounts to nearly 3,000, exclusive of 450 militia at Brownville, and on the road leading from Kingston, by land. Within two or three days I may have 300 more militia from Rome and Utica.

The ice will not probably be passable more than from six to ten days longer; it is not usually passable after the 15th of March. This unexpected movement of the enemy will effectually oppose the movements contemplated on our part, and I shall not think it advisable to order General Chandler to move at present. As soon as the fall of this place shall be decided, we shall be able to determine on other measures. If we hold this place, we will command the lake, and be able to act in concert with the troops at Niagara, while Chandler's brigade, with such other troops as may assemble in Vermont, may induce a return of a considerable part of those troops that have left Lower Canada.

When I ordered Pike to move, I directed General Chandler to have the provision at Plattsburg moved to Burlington. There was but a small proportion of our magazines at Plattsburg; they are principally at Burlington and White Hall.

Yours, with respect and esteem,

H. DEARBORN.

Hon. JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Extract of a letter from Major General Dearborn to the Secretary of War, dated

MARCH 14, 1813.

"From the most recent and probable information I have obtained, I am induced to believe that Sir George Prevost has concluded that it is too late to attack this place. He undoubtedly meditated a coup-de-main against the shipping here. All the apprehension is now at Kingston. Sir George has visited York and Niagara, and returned to Montreal. Several bodies of troops have lately passed up from Montreal; but such precautions have been taken to prevent their number being ascertained, as to render it impossible to form any accurate opinion of their forces, or even to imagine very nearly what they amount to. From various sources, I am perfectly satisfied that they are not in sufficient force to venture an attack on this place, knowing, as they do, that we have collected a fine body of troops from Greenbush and Plattsburg, and that the militia have been called in. We are probably just strong enough on each side to defend; but not in sufficient force to hazard an offensive movement. The difference of attacking and being attacked, as it regards the contiguous posts of Kingston and Sackett's Harbor, cannot be estimated at less than three or four thousand men, arising from the circumstance of militia acting merely on the defensive. I have ordered General Chandler with the 9th, 21st, and 25th regiments, to march for this place; Clark's regiment, and a company of artillery, to be left at Burlington for the present, where the regiment will be filled in a few weeks. I have ordered the recruits for the three regiments that will march for this place to be sent to Greenbush, and Colonel Larned is ordered there to receive them with Backus's dismounted dragoons, and other detachments from Pittsfield."

Failure of the Northern Army.

Extract of a letter from Major General Dearborn to the Secretary of War, dated,

SACKETT'S HARBOR, March 16, 1813.

"It was yesterday unanimously determined, in a council of the principal officers, including Commodore Chauncey, that we ought not, under existing circumstances, to make an attempt on Kingston, before the naval force can act. The harbors in this lake will not probably be open so as to admit of the vessels being moved until about the 15th of April."

Extract of a letter from Major General Dearborn to the Secretary of War, without date, proposing to pass by Kingston, and attack York, &c.

"To take or destroy the armed vessels at York will give us the complete command of the Lake. Commodore Chauncey can take with him ten or twelve hundred troops, to be commanded by Pike; take York, from thence proceed to Niagara, and attack Fort George by land and water, while the troops at Buffalo cross over and carry Forts Erie and Chippewa, and join those at Fort George, and then collect our whole force for an attack on Kingston. After the most mature deliberation, the above was considered by Commodore Chauncey and myself as the most certain of ultimate success."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Dearborn, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 29, 1813.

"Your despatches of the 11th and 14th instant from Sackett's Harbor, and one of the 22d, from Albany, have been received. The correspondence between you and Major Murray, in relation to an exchange of prisoners, has been referred to the Department of State. The alteration in the plan of campaign, so as to make Kingston the last object, instead of making it the first, would appear to be necessary, or at least proper; but the force assigned to the attack of the upper posts, is believed to be too small.

"Accident may prevent a co-operation of the corps at Buffalo. That sent from Sackett's Harbor should have in itself the power of reducing Forts George and Erie, and holding in check the militia who may be sent to support them. The ships can give little aid in the business, except merely in covering the landing. Double the number you propose sending would not be too many. Various considerations recommend the employment of a large and decisive force, and none, that I can think of, dissuade from it. If our first step in the campaign, and in the quarter from which most is expected, should fail, the disgrace of our arms will be complete. The public will lose all confidence in us, and we shall even cease to have any in ourselves. The party who first opens a campaign has many advantages over his antagonist; all of which, however, are the result of his being able to carry his whole force against a part of his enemies. Washington carried his whole force against the Hessians, in New Jersey, and beating them, recovered that moral strength, that self-confidence, which he had lost by many preceding disasters. We are now in that state of prostration that he was in, after he crossed the Delaware; but, like him, we may soon get on our legs again, if we are able to give some hard blows at the opening of the campaign. In this we cannot fail, provided the force we employ against his Western posts be sufficiently heavy. They must stand or fall by their own strength. They are perfectly isolated, and out of the reach of reinforcements; send, therefore, a force that shall overwhelm them—that shall leave nothing to chance. If I had not another motive, I would carry my whole strength, merely that their first service should be a successful one. The good effects of this will be felt throughout the campaign.

"I have hastened to give you these thoughts, under a full conviction of their usefulness; and shall only add, that there is no drawback upon this policy. When the fleet and army are gone, we have nothing at Sackett's Harbor to guard, nor will the place present an object to the enemy.

"How then would it read that we had lost our object on the Niagara, while we had another brigade at Sackett's Harbor doing nothing?"

Extract of a letter from Major General Dearborn, to the Secretary of War, dated

ALBANY, April 5, 1813.

"I have this day been honored with your letter of the 29th ultimo. As troops cannot, with safety, be transported from Sackett's Harbor to York, or Niagara, in bateaux or flat-bottomed boats, I must depend on Commodore Chauncey's armed vessels, with one or two other sloops, for the transportation of our troops; and it was considered doubtful, whether more than twelve hundred men could be so conveyed, which number I considered amply sufficient for the two first objects contemplated, but as many as can be transported with safety shall be sent. The co-operation of the troops under General Lewis may be relied on. Boyd and Winder are with him, and nothing but outrageous gales of wind can prevent success.

"The troops from Maryland and Pennsylvania arrived last evening. They, with the other detachments at Greenbush, will proceed towards Lake Ontario within two or three days. As soon as practicable, after sending off the troops, I shall move Westward."

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 19, 1813.

SIR: Taking for granted that General Prevost has not been able or willing to reinforce Malden, Erie, and George, and that he has assembled at Kingston a force of "six or eight thousand men," as stated by you, we must conclude that he means to hazard his more western posts, shorten his line of defence, and place his right flank on Lake Ontario.

This arrangement is, no doubt, in consequence of our preparations at Sackett's Harbor. These gave him reason to fear that we meant to cut his line of communication at that point, which, so long as he has a hope of keeping the command of the lake, is one of infinite importance to his views.

The danger, however, now is, that, in the event of the success of our present expedition, he may lose this hope, abandon Kingston, and concentrate his forces at Montreal.

This event is, in my opinion, so probable, as to render necessary a communication of the views of the President, in relation to the movements on your part, (which shall be subsequent to those now making,) on two suppositions:

- 1st. That the enemy will keep his ground at Kingston; and,
- 2d. That he will abandon that ground and withdraw from Montreal.

On the first supposition, there is no difficulty in either selecting our object, or the means of pursuing it. We ought to destroy the communication between Kingston and Montreal, by interposing a competent force between the two, and assailing the former by a joint operation of military and naval means.

Local circumstances favor this project. A few armed boats on Lake St. Francis stops all intercourse by water; in which case, cannon, military stores, and articles of subsistence in bulk, cannot be conveyed between Montreal and Kingston.

From Lake Ontario to Ogdensburg we command the navigation of the St. Lawrence by our armed vessels, and, under their protection, our army can be passed over and established on the Canada side, at the point deemed most proper for attack.

On the other supposition, that the British garrison is withdrawn from Kingston to Montreal, the old question of approaching him by Lake Champlain, or by the St. Lawrence, recurs, and ought now to be settled, so that there should be no unnecessary pause in our operations at a later and more momentous period of the campaign.

The circumstances in favor of the St. Lawrence route are these—

- 1st. Our force is now upon it.
- 2d. It furnishes a conveyance by water the whole distance.
- 3d. The enemy is not fortified on the St. Lawrence side, and has on it no strong outposts, which must be forced, in order to secure our flanks and rear, while engaged in the main attack; and,

4th. By approaching his flank (as this route enables you to do) instead of his front, we compel him to change his position, in which case he must do one of four things; either he must occupy the north side of the river, and give up the south, or he must occupy the south side and give up the north, or he must confine himself to the island, and give up both sides, or lastly, he must occupy both sides, and in this case expose himself to be beaten in detail.

None of these advantages are to be found in approaching him by the other route. Our troops are not upon it; we cannot move by water; his outposts are fortified, and must be carried by assault; his front is the only assailable point, and that is covered by the St. Lawrence; our attack must be made exactly where he wishes it to be made; all his arrangements and defences are, of course, in full operation, nor is he compelled to disturb them in the smallest degree. In a word, we must fight him on his previous dispositions and plans, and not on any of our own.

These reasons are deemed conclusive for preferring the route of the St. Lawrence, and your measures (subsequent to your present expedition) will, therefore, be conformed to this view of the subject.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General DEARBORN.

Extract of a letter from Major General Dearborn to the Secretary of War, dated SACKETT'S HARBOR, April 23, 1813.

"The troops embarked yesterday. Every vessel is crowded with as many men as possible; the total number, 1600, of the best men. I trust we shall sail within one or two hours. If the sails for a new vessel arrive within a day or two, and a small sloop from Oswego, which ought to have been here five days since, one hundred and fifty more men will go in them. The ice did not move out until the 19th; I arrived on the 20th."

HEADQUARTERS, YORK, UPPER CANADA,
April 23, 1813.

SIR: After a detention of some days, by adverse winds, we arrived here yesterday morning, and at eight o'clock commenced landing our troops about three miles westward of the town, and one and a half from the enemy's works.

Failure of the Northern Army.

The wind was high and in an unfavorable direction for our boats, which prevented the troops landing at a clear field, (the ancient site of the French fort Tarento.) The unfavorable wind prevented as many of the armed vessels from taking such positions as would effectually cover our landing as they otherwise would have done; but everything that could be done was effected. Our riflemen under Major Forsyth first landed under a heavy fire from Indians and other troops. General Sheaffe commanded in person. He had collected his whole force in the woods near where the wind obliged our troops to land, consisting of about seven hundred regulars and militia, and one hundred Indians. Major Forsyth was supported, as promptly as possible, with other troops; but the contest was sharp and severe for near half an hour. The enemy was repulsed by a far less number than their own, and as soon as General Pike landed with seven or eight hundred men, and the remainder of the troops were pushing for the shore, the enemy retreated to their works; and as soon as the whole of the troops had landed and formed on the clear ground intended for the first landing, they advanced through a thick wood to the open ground near the enemy's works, and after carrying one battery by assault, were moving on in columns towards the main works: when the head of the columns was within about sixty rods of the enemy, a tremendous explosion occurred from a large magazine prepared for the purpose, which discharged such immense quantities of stone as to produce a most unfortunate effect on our troops. I have not yet been able to collect the returns of our killed and wounded, but our loss by the explosion must, I fear, exceed one hundred; and among them I have to lament the loss of the brave and excellent officer Brigadier General Pike, who received such a confusion from a large stone as terminated his valuable life within a few hours. His loss will be severely felt. Previous to the explosion, the enemy had retired into town, excepting a party of regular troops, which did not retire early enough to avoid the shock; it is said that upwards of forty of them were destroyed. General Sheaffe moved off with the regular troops, and left directions with the commanding officer of the militia to make the best terms he could. In the meantime, all further resistance on the part of the enemy ceased, and the outlines of a capitulation were agreed on. As soon as I was informed of General Pike's being wounded, I went on shore. I had been induced to confide the immediate command of the troops in action to General Pike from a conviction that he fully expected it, and would be much mortified at being deprived of the honor, which he highly appreciated. Every movement was under my view. Our troops behaved with great firmness, and deserve much applause, especially those who were first engaged, under circumstances that would have tried the firmness of veterans. Our loss in the action in the morning, and in carrying the first battery, was not great, probably about fifty killed and wounded; among them were a full proportion of officers; and although the enemy had a decided advantage in point of numbers and position at the commencement, their loss was greater than ours, particularly in officers.

It was with the greatest exertion that the small vessels of the fleet could work into the harbor against a gale of wind directly ahead; but as soon as they got in contact with the batteries a tremendous cannonade commenced from 24 and 32-pounders, and was kept up without intermission under a heavy fire from two batteries, until the enemy's batteries were carried or blown up by the explosion, which undoubtedly had a powerful effect on the enemy. I am under the greatest obligations to Commodore Chauncey for his able and indefatigable exertions in every possible manner that could give facility and effect to the expedition. He is equally estimable for deliberate, sound judgment, bravery, and industry. The Government could not have made a more fortunate selection for the important trust he holds. Unfortunately, the enemy's armed ship, the "Prince Regent," left this place for Kingston four days before we arrived. A large ship on the stocks, and nearly planked up, with a large stock of naval stores, was set on fire by the enemy soon after the explosion of the magazine. There are no vessels fit for use in the harbor. A considerable quantity of military stores and provisions remained. We shall not possess the means of transporting the prisoners from this place, and must of course leave them on parole. I hope we shall so far complete the necessary measures at this place in the course of this day as to be able to sail to-morrow for Niagara, by which route I send this by a small vessel, with notice to General Lewis of our approach.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

Hon. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

HEADQUARTERS, NIAGARA, May 3, 1813.

SIR: I arrived at this place last evening with Commodore Chauncey in his fast-sailing schooner the Lady of the Lake: we left the fleet with the troops on board in York road. The wind has been so unfavorable as to render it impracticable to come to this place with any prospect of effecting a landing.

I have had a conference with Generals Lewis, Boyd, and Winder, at which Commodore Chauncey was present. I did not find the preparations at this place as complete as could have been expected; but as soon as the wind will permit, we shall make a descent. Commodore Chauncey has returned to the fleet, and will sail for this place as soon as he shall judge the wind favorable for crossing and landing the troops. In the meantime we shall be preparing to act in concert. General Boyd will take command of the brigade lately commanded by General Pike. We find the weather on this lake at this season of the year such as to render naval operations extremely tedious and uncertain, especially when we have to debark troops on the shore of the lake where there are no harbors. Westerly winds are necessary; we have none but easterly. I have no doubt of ultimate success, unless harassed and dispersed by the elements.

I enclose a return of the killed and wounded. You will observe the loss was very small excepting that produced by the explosion. As nearly as I have been able to ascertain, the loss of the enemy amounted from ninety to one hundred killed, two hundred wounded, and upwards of three hundred prisoners. I have not been able to ascertain precisely the number of the militia put on their parole; I presume it could not be less than five hundred. There was an immense depot of naval and military stores. York was the principal depot for Niagara and Detroit; and, notwithstanding the immense amount which was destroyed by them, we found more than we could bring off. General Sheaffe's baggage and papers fell into my hands. These papers are a valuable acquisition; I have not had time for a full examination of them. A scalp was found in the Executive and Legislative Chamber, suspended near the Speaker's chair, in company with the mace and other emblems of royalty. I intend sending it to you with a correct account of the facts relative to the place and situation in which it was found.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

HEADQUARTERS, NIAGARA, May 13, 1813.

SIR: Commodore Chauncey, with the fleet and troops, arrived here on the evening of the 8th, and in the course of the night the troops were debarked in a very sickly or depressed state. A large proportion of the officers and men were sickly and debilitated. It was deemed expedient to give them time to recruit their health and spirits, and in the meantime for the fleet to return to Sackett's Harbor, and take on board one thousand additional troops; and orders were despatched to Utica, Rome, and Oswego, to have the troops at those places forwarded here in boats from Oswego. Backus's corps of light dragoons, about four hundred, principally dismounted, and five hundred of the 11th regiment from Burlington, have been ordered to Sackett's Harbor. These, with three hundred volunteers, and a full company of artillery, are to form a garrison at that place. Additional cannon will be mounted. General Brown of the militia has been requested to hold three or four hundred men of the immediate vicinity in readiness to aid the garrison, in the event of any attack. My intention is to collect the main body of the troops at this place, and as soon as Commodore Chauncey returns, and the forces from Oswego arrive, to commence operations in as spirited and effectual a manner as practicable. This change in the proposed system of operations has been rendered necessary by a long series of the most unfortunate winds and weather that could have occurred at this season, and such as could not have been contemplated.

Colonel Scott reached this yesterday in boats from Oswego, with three hundred men. He was seven days wind bound in different places; and narrowly escaped the loss of his boats and men. I had expected him on the 3d. I had almost given him up for lost.

General Harrison is invested; and presuming on the uncertainty of events, I shall make calculation of a reinforcement to the enemy of British and Indians from Detroit. We shall be prepared for them; and I shall consider a concentration of their force rather as a fortunate circumstance than otherwise.

I observed in a former letter, that, on my arrival here on the evening of the 2d, the preparations for an immediate co-operation were not as complete as could have been expected. General Lewis was at fourteen miles distance. Winder, with his command, was at Black Rock. The boats had not been transported from Schlosser; not one of the scows completed; the heavy guns and mortars not placed in the batteries; two 18 and two 12-pounders not mounted; but, with all these defects, we should have made an attack on the 4th or 5th, if the fleet had arrived with the troops in health, on the 3d, as was expected.

I have the honor to be, sir, most respectfully, your obedient and humble servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
UPPER CANADA, May 27, 1813.

SIR: The light troops under the command of Colonel Scott and Major Forsyth landed this morning at 9 o'clock. Major General Lewis's division, with Colonel Porter's command of light artillery, supported them. General Boyd's brigade landed immediately after the light troops, and Generals Winder and Chandler followed in quick succession. The landing was warmly and obstinately disputed by the British forces; but the coolness and intrepidity of our troops soon compelled them to give ground in every direction. General Chandler, with the reserve, (composed of his brigade and Colonel Macomb's artillery,) covered the whole. Commodore Chauncey had made the most judicious arrangements for silencing the enemy's batteries near the point of landing. The Army is under the greatest obligation to that able naval commander for his indefatigable exertions, in co-operation in all its important movements, and especially in its operations this day. Our batteries succeeded in rendering Fort George untenable; and when the enemy had been beaten from his position, and found it necessary to re-enter it, after firing a few guns, and setting fire to the magazines, which soon exploded, moved off rapidly by different routes. Our light troops pursued them several miles. The troops having been under arms from one o'clock in the morning were too much exhausted for any further pursuit. We are now in possession of Fort George and its immediate dependencies; to-morrow we shall proceed further on. The behaviour of our troops, both officers and men, entitles them to the highest praise; and the difference in our loss with that of the enemy, when we consider the advantages his positions afforded him, is astonishing. We had seventeen killed and forty-five wounded. The enemy had ninety killed and one hundred and sixty wounded of the regular troops. We have taken one hundred prisoners, exclusive of the wounded. Colonel Meyers, of the 49th, was wounded and taken prisoner. Of ours only one commissioned officer was killed, Lieutenant Hobart, of the light artillery. Enclosed is the report of Major General Lewis.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great consideration and respect, your most obedient servant,
H. DEARBORN.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

ON THE FIELD, ONE O'CLOCK,
May 27, 1813.

DEAR SIR: Fort George and its dependencies are ours. The enemy, beaten at all points, has blown up his magazines and retired. It is impossible at this moment to say anything of individual gallantry. There was no man who did not perform his duty in a manner which did honor to himself and his country. Scott and Forsyth's commands, supported by Boyd's and Winder's brigades, sustained the brunt of the action. Our loss is trifling; perhaps not more than twenty killed, and twice that number wounded. The enemy left in the hospital one hundred and twenty-four, and I sent several on board the fleet. We have also made about one hundred prisoners of the regular forces.

I am, dear sir, your obedient servant,
MORGAN LEWIS.

Maj. Gen. DEARBORN,
Commander-in-Chief Northern Army.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
May 29, 1813.

SIR: General Lewis was ordered to march yesterday morning with Chandler's and Winder's brigades, the light artillery, dragoons, light infantry, and riflemen, in pursuit of the enemy, by the way of Queenstown. I had received satisfactory information that the enemy had made a stand on the mountain, at a place called the Beaver Dams, where he had a deposite of provisions and stores, and that he had been joined by three hundred regulars from Kingston, landed from small vessels near the head of the Lake. I had ascertained that he was calling in the militia, and had presumed that he would confide in the strength of his position, and venture an action, by which an opportunity would be afforded to cut off his retreat.

I have been disappointed. Although the troops from Fort Erie and Chippewa had joined the main body at the Beaver Dams, he broke up yesterday precipitately, continued his route along the mountain, and will reach the head of the Lake by that route. Lieutenant Colonel Preston took possession of Fort Erie and its dependencies last evening. The fort had been abandoned, and the magazines blown up. I have ordered General Lewis to return without delay to this place, and, if the winds favor us, we may yet cut off the enemy's retreat at York; but, unfortunately, we have plenty of rain but no wind; it may, however, change for the better in a few hours. I shall afford Commodore Chauncey every facility in my power in his preparations for commanding Lake Erie. He is very anxious to return to Sackett's Harbor; for, until his other ship is fitted, it is not certain that he can continue in the command of Lake Ontario. I was the last evening honored with your despatches of the 15th instant. I have taken measures in relation to the twenty-three prisoners who are to be put in close confinement.
13th Con. 2d Sess.—75

I have the honor to be, sir, with high consideration and respect, your obedient servant,
H. DEARBORN.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

Extract of a letter from Major General Dearborn to the Secretary of War, dated

NEWARK, UPPER CANADA, June 4, 1813.

"Chandler and Winder are in pursuit of the enemy, who has halted about fifty-five miles from here. I am still very feeble, and gain strength but slowly."

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
June 6, 1813.

SIR: I have received an express from the head of the Lake this evening, with the intelligence that our troops were attacked, at two o'clock this morning, by the whole British force and Indians; and, by some strange fatality, though our loss in numbers was small, and the enemy was completely routed and driven from the field, both Brigadier Generals Chandler and Winder were taken prisoners. They had advanced to ascertain the situation of a company of artillery when the attack commenced. General Chandler had his horse shot under him, and was bruised by the fall. General Vincent, their commander, is supposed to have been killed. Colonel Clark was mortally wounded, and fell into our hands with sixty prisoners of the 49th. The command devolved on Colonel Burn, who has retired to the Forty Mile creek. If either of the general officers had remained in command, the enemy would have been pursued and cut up, or if Colonel Burn had been an officer of infantry. The loss of the enemy in killed, wounded, and prisoners, must exceed two hundred and fifty. The enemy sent in a flag next morning, with a request to bury their dead. Generals Lewis and Boyd set off immediately to join the advanced army. I never so severely felt the want of health as at present, at a time when my services might, perhaps, be most useful. I hope General Hampton will repair here as soon as possible.

Failure of the Northern Army.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

JUNE 8, 1813.

There was a mistake in the arrival of the express mail. Since writing the above, the enemy's fleet has passed, consisting of two large ships and four heavy schooners. I have, consequently, deemed it prudent to concentrate the forces at this point.

H. D.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
June 8, 1813.

SIR: I have been honored with your letters of the 26th and 27th ultimo, and a duplicate of one of the 19th of April. My ill state of health renders it extremely painful to attend to the current duties; and, unless my health improves soon, I fear I shall be compelled to retire to some place where my mind may be more at ease for a short time. Colonel Macomb proceeded with two hundred men, with the Commodore, to Sackett's Harbor. Lieutenant Colonel Ripley has also gone, by the way of Oswego, to the harbor, with his regiment, where he will be joined by several hundred recruits; he took charge of the provisions to Oswego. The Commodore will not probably venture out until his new ship is fit for sea. The enemy has now the command of the Lake, and, as long as that is the case, any offensive operations below this must be suspended. I had intended placing a small garrison at Fort Erie, and a stronger one at Fort George; but, as you have directed otherwise, I shall select Fort George, as guarding the only harbor on the southern shore of the Lake. Detroit will be the safest harbor on Lake Erie. I have, by the request of Commodore Chauncey, detached two hundred men to aid Captain Perry in removing his armed vessels from Black Rock to Presque Isle. Commodore Chauncey is unwilling to approach Malden, unless he can have a reinforcement to General Harrison of our regulars. As my command does not extend to Malden, I ask your directions on this subject. The Commodore is anxious that his fleet on Lake Erie should proceed with troops to Michilimackinac and St. Joseph, as soon as the business shall be decided at Detroit. On taking possession of this place, the inhabitants came in in numbers, and gave their paroles. I have promised them protection. A large majority are friendly to the United States, and fixed in their hatred against the Government of Great Britain. If they should generally be made prisoners of war, and taken from their families, it would have a most unfavorable effect on our military operations in the provinces. The whole country would be driven to a state of desperation, and satisfy them, beyond a doubt, that we had no intention of holding the provinces. The same effect would be produced on the Indians, who are now principally quiet for fear of losing their valuable tract of land on Grand river. I had authorized the civil magistrates to combine in the due exercise of their functions, and cannot, with propriety, revoke this authority, unless specially directed.

The whole of our troops, officers, and men, in the action of the 27th, discovered a degree of ardor and readiness for action, which evinced a determination to do honor to themselves and country. The animating example set by Colonel Scott and General Boyd, in landing and repulsing the enemy, deserves particular mention. I am greatly indebted to Colonel Porter, Major Armistead, and Captain Totten, for their judicious arrangements and skilful execution in demolishing the enemy's forts and batteries, and to the officers of the artillery generally, who had the direction of the guns.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

Extract of a letter from Major General Morgan Lewis to the Secretary of War, dated

NIAGARA, June 14, 1813.

"You will perceive, by the enclosed copy of orders, marked 1, that General Dearborn, from indisposition, has resigned the command, not only of the Niagara army, but of the district. I have doubts whether he will ever again be fit for service. He has been repeatedly in a state of convalescence, but relapses on the least agitation of mind.

"In my last, I mentioned the unfortunate circumstance of the capture of our two Brigadiers, Chandler and Winder. The particulars are detailed in the report of Colonel Burn, marked 2, which he gives from the best information he could collect. His corps lay a considerable distance from the scene of active operation, as you will perceive by the enclosed diagram. The light corps spoken of, were Captains Hindman's, Nicholas's, and Biddle's companies, of the 2d artillery, serving as infantry. These three gentlemen, and Captains Archer and Towson, of the same regiment, and Leonard of the light artillery, are soldiers who would honor any service. Their gallantry, and that of their companies, was equally conspicuous on this occasion as in the affair of the 27th ultimo. A view of General Chandler's encampment will be sufficient to show that his disaster was owing to its arrangement; its centre being its weakest point, and that being discovered by the enemy in the evening, received the combined attack of his whole force, and his line was completely cut. It is said, though I cannot vouch for its truth, that General Winder saw this, and remonstrated against it. The gallantry of the 5th, 25th, and part of the 23d, and light troops, saved the army; of the 5th, it is said, that, when the day broke, not a man was missing; and that a part of the 23d, under Major Armstrong, was found sustaining its left flank. Their fire was irresistible, and the enemy was compelled to give way. Could he have been pressed the next morning, his destruction was inevitable. He was dispersed in every direction, and even his commanding General was missing, without his hat or horse. I understand he was found the next evening, almost famished, at a distance of four miles from the scene of action.

"Lieutenant McChesney's gallantry recovered a piece of artillery, and prevented the capture of others. He merits promotion for it.

"On the evening of the sixth of June, I received the order No. 4, and joined the army at five in the afternoon of the 7th. I found it at the Forty Mile creek, ten miles in the rear of the ground on which it had been attacked, encamped on a plain of about a mile in width, with its right flank on the Lake, and its left on the creek, which skirts the base of a perpendicular mountain of considerable height. On my route, I received Nos. 5 and 6, enclosed,

"At 6 in the evening, the hostile fleet hove in sight, though its character could not be ascertained with precision. We lay on our arms all night. At dawn of day struck our tents, and described the hostile squadron abreast of us, about a mile from the shore. Our boats, which transported the principal part of our baggage and camp equipage, lay on the beach; it was a dead calm; and, about six, the enemy towed in a large schooner, which opened her fire on our boats. As soon as she stood for shore, her object being evident, I ordered down Archer's and Towson's companies, with four pieces of artillery, to resist her attempts. I, at the same time, sent Captain Totten, of the engineers, (a most valuable officer,) to construct a temporary furnace for heating shot, which was prepared and in operation in less than thirty minutes. Her fire was returned with a vivacity and effect (excelled by no artillery in the universe) which soon compelled her to retire. A party of savages now made their appearance on the brow of the mountain, (which, being perfectly bald, exhibited them to view,) and commenced a fire on our camp. I ordered Colonel Chrystie to dislodge them, who entered on the service with alacrity, but found himself anticipated by Lieutenant Eldridge, the adjutant of the regiment, who, with a promptness and gallantry highly honorable to that young officer, had already gained the summit of the mountain with a party of volunteers, and routed the barbarian allies of the Defender of the Christian Faith. This young man merits the notice of Government.

"These little affairs cost us not a man. Sir James L. Yeo, being disappointed of a tragedy, next determined, in true dramatic style, to amuse us with a farce. An officer with a flag was sent to me from his ship, advising me that, as I was invested with savages in my rear, a fleet in my front, and a powerful army on my flank, he, and the officers commanding His Britannic Majesty's land forces, thought it a duty to demand a surrender of my army. I answered that the message was too ridiculous to merit a reply. No. 7 was delivered to me at about six this morning. Between seven and eight o'clock, the few wagons we had being loaded, first with sick, and next with ammunition, &c., the residue of camp equipage and baggage was put in the boats, and a detachment of two hundred men of the 6th regiment detailed to proceed in them. Orders were prepared to be given them to defend the boats, and, if assailed by any of the enemy's small vessels, to carry them by boarding. By some irregularity which I have not been able to discover, the boats put off without the detachments, induced probably by the stillness of the morning. When they had progressed about three miles, a breeze sprung up, and an armed schooner overhauled them. Those who were enterprising kept on and escaped; others ran to the shore, and deserted their boats. We have lost twelve of the number, principally containing the baggage of the officers and men.

"At ten, I put the army in motion on our return to this place. The savages and incorporated militia hung on our flanks and rear throughout the march, and picked up a few stragglers. On our retiring, the British army advanced, and now occupies the ground we left."

Papers referred to by General Lewis.

HEADQUARTERS, NIAGARA, June 6, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: You will please to proceed, with as little delay as may be, and take command of the advanced army. Brigadier Generals Boyd and Swartwout, and Colonel Scott, will accompany you. I have ordered an additional escort of light artillery, to be equipped as cavalry, to attend you. You will attack the enemy as soon as practicable; your force will insure success. Every possible effort should be made for preventing the enemy's escape.

May success and glory attend you.

Yours, with esteem,

H. DEARBORN.

Major General LEWIS.

NIAGARA, June 6, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: A ship having appeared this morning steering towards the head of the Lake, which is undoubtedly one of the enemy's ships, (others are appearing,) you will please to return with the troops to this place as soon as possible.

Yours, with esteem,

H. DEARBORN.

P. S. The object of the enemy's fleet must be intended to cover the retreat of their troops, or to bring on a reinforcement.

H. D.

Major General LEWIS.

JUNE 6, 1813.

It is possible the fleet in sight may be our own; a few hours will probably enable you to determine and act accordingly.

General LEWIS.

H. DEARBORN.

Failure of the Northern Army.

DEAR GENERAL: I am induced to suspect that the enemy's fleet have an intention on this place. Two small schooners have been examining the shore very minutely for three or four hours this afternoon. They have gone on towards the head of the Lake, and their ships appear to have taken the same course. They may take on board additional troops near the head of the Lake, and be here before you reach this place. You will please to send Milton's detachment, and 500 of Chandler's brigade, and Colonel Burn's light dragoons, with all possible despatch; they ought, if possible, to be here sometime to-morrow forenoon. You will follow with the remainder of the troops as soon as practicable. It will be necessary to take care that your boats are not taken or lost. General Swartwout and Colonel Scott should return as soon as they can.

Yours, with esteem,

H. DEARBORN.

General LEWIS.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
June 10, 1813.

By reason of the temporary indisposition of Major General Dearborn, the command of the troops on this frontier, and of the ninth military department of the United States, devolves on Major General Lewis. All persons concerned are notified accordingly.

By command.

W. SCOTT, Adj. General.

Extract of a letter from Colonel James Burn, 2d light dragoons, to Major General Dearborn.

"In the afternoon of the 5th, our advance guard, consisting of the light infantry, under the command of Captains Hindman, Biddle, and Nicholas, a part of the rifle corps, under Captain Lytle, and a detachment of the 2d dragoons, under Capt. Selden, commenced a sharp skirmish with the advance of the enemy, said to be a detachment of the 49th regiment, which soon retreated, covered by a thick woods, having, however, several wounded on both sides, and one dragoon horse killed. In the evening, our advance returned behind Stony creek, where the army took a position for the night. The light infantry, and part of the rifle corps on the right of the 25th regiment, formed the right wing. The artillery, under Captains Towson and L. Leonard, the centre. The 5th, 16th, 23d, and some riflemen, the left wing, and the cavalry in the rear. A strong picket guard was posted some distance in front, also strong flank and rear guards, in such manner as to surround the whole encampment with sentinels; the troops lay under arms, without any covering. Our numbers in the field did not exceed one thousand—three hundred effectives of the 13th and 14th regiments having encamped on the borders of the Lake, about three miles distant, for the protection of the boats. The enemy forced our picket, and attacked us, about two o'clock in the morning, (which was very dark,) with their army and Indians, expecting, no doubt, to throw us into confusion. Their views were, in this instance, however, completely frustrated; and, when the day dawned, none were to be seen, except their killed and wounded, who covered the field of battle. The attack began on our right, and was gallantly repelled by the fire of the light troops and 25th regiment, commanded by Major Smith. In a few minutes, it became general along the whole line, and was nobly returned by the artillery of the centre, commanded by Captains Towson and L. Leonard, and again by the troops of the left wing, viz: the 5th, under Lieutenant Colonel Milton, the 23d, commanded by Major Armstrong, and the 16th. The fire continued, with little intermission, for one hour, during which time, the enemy attempted, by frequent charges, to break our line, but without effect, being obliged to give way by the well-directed fire of our brave troops.

"The 13th and 14th regiments (which had been detached the preceding evening) were active in making prisoners, and advanced with much ardor to the field, in hopes of sharing, with the gallant 5th, and 25th, 23d, and light troops, the glory of another combat. But the unfortunate capture of Brigadier Generals Chandler and Winder, who were taken in the action, unknown to any part of the army, and hurried into the enemy's lines, prevented the future operations from being carried into effect with the promptitude which would assuredly have taken place had either of those officers been present to command.

"You will be surprised to find our loss so small; that of the enemy exceeds ours much; they lost in killed about sixty, many wounded, and upwards of seventy prisoners, all regulars, and principally of the 49th regiment. Several of their officers were killed, wounded, and missing. A flag was sent by Colonel Hervey, asking permission to make inquiries for them; also, to be allowed to send a surgeon to attend their own wounded, which I readily granted. On the return of daylight, I found the command of the army had devolved on me, and, being at a loss what steps to pursue in the unpleasant dilemma, occasioned by the capture of our Generals, finding the ammunition of many of the troops nearly expended, I had recourse to a council of the field officers present, of whom a majority coincided in opinion with me, that we ought to retire to our former position at the Forty Mile creek, where we could be supplied with ammunition and provisions, and either advance or remain, until further orders.

"Every aid was afforded by the staff. The assistant Adjutant General, Major Johnston, and Brigade Majors Jones and Wartenby, exerted themselves in rendering all the assistance in their power.

"The army, on this occasion, has proved its firmness and bravery, by keeping its position in a night attack, in which the yells of the Indians, mingled with the roaring of cannon and musketry, were calculated to intimidate. The enemy charged repeatedly, and so dark was the night, that our army could not distinguish friend from foe; in one of those, they succeeded in carrying off a six-pounder, a howitzer, and a caisson, to the great mortification of our brave artillery. I presume it was on that occasion, also, that we lost our Generals, who were distinctly heard encouraging our men to fight. The squadron of dragoons remained formed, and steady at their post, but could not act, on account of the darkness of the night, and the thickness of the adjacent woods. Much credit is due to the troops, generally, but too much praise cannot be said of the conduct of the 5th and 25th regiments."

Failure of the Northern Army.

MONTREAL, June 18, 1813.

SIR: I deem it my duty to improve the earliest opportunity possible to give you a more detailed account of the affair of the 6th instant, near Stony creek, than I have before had it in my power to do.

On the morning of the 5th, I arrived at Forty Mile creek. The detachment under Gen. Winder was then under marching orders for Stony creek. After a short halt, the whole marched for that place, and arrived there between five and six o'clock P. M., at which place a small picket of the enemy was posted, but retired on our approach. The advanced guard pursued, and soon fell in with a picket of about one hundred strong, under Colonel Williams. A skirmish ensued. I hastened the main body. Williams retreated, and our advance pursued. The pursuit was continued rather longer than I could have wished, but returned to their proper position in the line of march, not far from sunset. I had ordered the 13th and 14th, who were in the rear, to take a position for the night near the mouth of the creek, to cover the boats, (should they arrive,) which would be on the route which I intended to pursue the next morning; and, a favorable position presenting itself, I encamped with the residue of the troops (except Captain Archer's company of artillery) which accompanied the 13th and 14th on the spot where we had halted, with an advanced picket from half to three-quarters of a mile in front, with express orders for them to keep out constantly a patrol. A right and left flank guard and a rear guard were also posted. I gave positive orders for the troops to lay on their arms. Contrary to my orders, fires were kindled; but there are doubts whether this operated for or against us, as the fires of the 25th, which were in front, and by my orders had been abandoned, enabled us to see a small part of the enemy, while the fires on our left enabled the enemy to see our line. On the whole, I think it operated against us. I did expect the enemy would attack us that night, if he intended to fight; but, perhaps, this was not expected by all. I had my horse confined near me, and directed that the harness should not be taken from the artillery horses. I directed where and how the line should be formed, in case of attack. About an hour before daylight, on the morning of the 6th, the alarm was given. I was instantly up, and the 25th, which lay near me, was almost as instantly formed, as well as the 5th and 23d, which were on the left, under the immediate eye of General Winder. Owing to the neglect of the front picket, or some other cause, the British officers say that they were not hailed, nor an alarm given, until they were within three hundred yards of our line. The extreme darkness prevented us from seeing or knowing at what point they intended to attack us, until an attack was made on our right. A well-directed fire was opened upon them from the 25th, and from nearly the whole line. After a few minutes, I heard several muskets in our rear, in the direction of the rear guard, and then expected that the enemy had gained our rear by some path unknown to me, and were about to attack us in rear. I instantly ordered Colonel Milton, with the 5th, to form in our rear near the woods, to meet such circumstances as might take place, knowing that I could call him to any other point, if necessary, at any moment. I had observed that the artillery was not covered, and directed General Winder to cause the 23d to be formed so far to the right that their right should cover the artillery. At this moment, I heard a new burst of fire from the enemy's left on our right, and, not able to see anything which took place, I set out full speed towards the right to take measures to prevent my right flank from being turned, which I expected was the object of the enemy. I had proceeded but a few yards, before my horse fell under me, by which fall I received a serious injury. Here was a time when I have no recollection of what passed, but I presume it was not long. As soon as I recovered, I recollected what my object was, and made my way to the right, and gave Major Smith such directions as I thought proper to prevent his right from being turned by surprise. I was then returning toward the centre, and, when near the artillery, heard men, who, by the noise, appeared to be in confusion, it being the point at which I expected the 23d to be formed. I expected it was that regiment. I approached them, and, as soon as I was near enough, I saw a body of men, who I thought to be the 23d, in rear of the artillery, broken. I hobbled in amongst them, and began to rally them, and directed them to form; but I soon found my mistake; it was the British 49th, who had pushed forward to the head of their column, and gained the rear of the artillery. I was immediately disarmed, and conveyed down the column to its rear. It was not yet day, and the extreme darkness of the night, to which was added the smoke of the fire, put it totally out of our power to see the situation of the enemy. This was all that saved their columns from sure and total destruction, of which some of their officers are aware. After seeing the situation of the column as I passed, I did hope and expect that General Winder, on the first dawn of light, would see their situation, and bring Colonel Milton with the 5th (who I had still kept in reserve, until I could have daylight to discern their situation) to attack this column, which, I am sure, he would have done to advantage; but, to my mortification, I soon learned that he had fallen into the same mistake with myself; and, by endeavoring to learn what was taking place in the centre, he was also taken, as well as Major Van De Venter. To the extreme darkness of the night, the enemy's knowledge of his intended point of attack, and our not knowing at what point to expect him, must be attributed his partial success, and not to a want of strength or bravery in our troops, who generally behaved remarkably well under all the circumstances; and, however unfortunate the event, as it relates to myself, I only ask that all the circumstances may be taken into consideration in making up your opinion upon the conduct of Gen. Winder and myself in this affair, which I am sure you will do, and I flatter myself you will see no cause of censure. I regret that my decrepit situation, and the rapidity with which we have been brought to this place, has put it out of my power to give you a detailed account of the affair earlier. I am now able to walk some with the aid of a cane, and hope I shall continue to recover.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN CHANDLER,
Brigadier General.

Major General DEARBORN.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
June 12, 1813.

SIR: As the General is unable to write, I am directed by him to inform you, that, in addition to the debility and fever he has been afflicted with, he has, within the last twenty-four hours, experienced a violent spasmodic attack on his breast, which has obliged him to relinquish business altogether, and the command is given over to Major General Lewis, who will, in future, make the necessary communications to the Department of War. The British fleet still rides triumphant in this section of the lake.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect and consideration, your obedient and humble servant,

SAMUEL S. CONNER,
A. D. C. to Gen. Dearborn.

Hon. Gen. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Dearborn, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 19, 1813.

"Your letters of the 6th and 8th instant have been received. There is, indeed, some strange fatality attending our efforts. I cannot disguise from you the surprise occasioned by the two escapes of a beaten enemy: first, on the 27th ultimo, and again on the 1st instant. Battles are not gained when an inferior and broken enemy is not destroyed. Nothing is done, while anything that might have been done is omitted. This maxim is as old as the profession of arms, and in no walk of life applies with as much force as in that of a soldier.

"Should Proctor have retired from Malden, and been able to effect a junction with Vincent's corps at the head of the Lake, it has been done for one of two purposes: either to dispute with you the possession of the peninsula, or more securely to effect the general retreat to Kingston. The latter is the more probable conjecture of the two, and is strengthened by the appearance of Yeo on the upper part of the Lake, and by the position which Vincent has taken there."

Extract, dated

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
June 20, 1813.

"SIR: I have been so reduced in strength as to be incapable of any command. Brigadier General Boyd is the only general officer present; and, from resignations, sickness, and other contingencies, the number of regimental officers present, fit for duty, are far below what the service requires. A considerable proportion of our army being composed of new recruits, and the weather having been extremely unfavorable to health, the sick have become so numerous, in addition to the wounded, as to reduce the effective force far below what could have been contemplated; but if the weather should become favorable, which ought to be expected, a great part of the sick will probably be fit for duty in a short time. The enemy have been reinforced at the head of the Lake with about 500 men of the 104th regiment. A vessel carrying ammunition and other munitions of war, bound to the head of the Lake, was captured, four days since, by one of Commodore Chauncey's schooners, from which I conclude, that the enemy will endeavor to keep up such a force at or near the head of the Lake, as to prevent any part of our force in this quarter from joining, or proceeding to Sackett's Harbor, for the purpose of attacking Kingston; and such is the state of the roads in this flat country, in consequence of continual rains, as to render any operations against the enemy extremely difficult, without the aid of a fleet for the transportation of provisions, ammunition, and other necessary supplies. The enemy would probably retreat on our approach, and keep out of our reach, being covered by one or more armed vessels, which remain on this part of the Lake. The whole of these embarrassments have resulted from a temporary loss of the command of the Lake. The enemy has availed himself of the advantage, and forwarded reinforcements and supplies."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Dearborn, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 1, 1813.

"The leisure you now have offers a fine opportunity for the adjutants and inspectors general to attend to their particular duties. Some of the parties of which you speak, from the enemy, may practise a trick on those who follow them. These last ought to be very circumspect. Chauncey will, I hope, soon reappear on the Lake. A battle will then decide which of us shall be victor for the campaign. I am afraid that we have all along acted on a belief, very pleasing, but ill founded, viz: that we were ahead of the enemy as to naval means and naval preparation on the Lakes. Are we sure that our calculations with regard to Lake Erie have been better than those with regard to Lake Ontario? A week or two will decide this question."

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
June 25, 1813.

SIR: I have the mortification of informing you of an unfortunate and unaccountable event, which occurred yesterday. On the 23d, at evening, Lieutenant Colonel Boerstler, with 570 men, infantry, artillery, cavalry, and riflemen, in due proportion, was ordered to march, by the way of Queenstown, to a place called the Beaver Dams, on the high ground, about eight or nine miles from Queenstown, to attack and disperse a body of the enemy collected there for the purpose of procuring provisions, and harassing those inhabitants who are considered friendly to the United States. Their force was, from the most direct information, composed of one company of the 104th regiment, above 80 strong; from 150 to 200 militia; and from 50 to 60 Indians. At eight o'clock yesterday morning, when within about two miles of the Beaver Dams, our detachment was attacked from an ambuscade, but soon drove the enemy some distance into the woods, and then retired to a clear field, and sent an express for a reinforcement, saying he would maintain his position until reinforced. A reinforcement of 300 men marched immediately, under the command of Colonel Chrystie; but on arriving at Queenstown, Colonel Chrystie received authentic information that Lieutenant Colonel Boerstler, with his command, had surrendered to the enemy, and the reinforcement returned to camp. A man who belonged to a small corps of mounted volunteer riflemen came in this morning, who states that the enemy surrounded our detachment in the woods, and towards twelve o'clock commenced a general attack; that our troops fought more than two hours, until the artillery had expended the whole of its ammunition, and then surrendered; and at the time of the surrender, the informant made his escape. Why it should have been deemed proper to remain several hours in a position surrounded with woods, without either risking a decisive action, or effecting a retreat, remains to be accounted for, as well as the project of waiting for a reinforcement from a distance of fifteen or sixteen miles.

No information has been received of the killed or wounded. The enemy's fleet has again arrived in our neighborhood.

With respect and esteem, I am, &c.,

H. DEARBORN.

Hon. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 6, 1813.

SIR: I have the President's orders to express to you his decision that you retire from the command of district No. 9, and of the troops within the same, until your health be re-established, and until farther orders.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General HENRY DEARBORN.

Correspondence between the Secretary of War and Brigadier General Boyd.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Brigadier General Boyd, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 30, 1813.

"The restriction put upon you with regard to the enemy was but commensurate with their command of the Lake. So long as they had wings, and you had only feet, so long as they could be transported, supplied, and reinforced, by water, and at will, common sense, as well as military principles, put you on the defensive. These circumstances changed, the reason of the rule changes with them; and it now becomes your business, in concert with the fleet, to harass and destroy the enemy, wherever you can find him. Of the competency of your force there can be no doubt, provided your estimate of his be but tolerably correct."

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 30, 1813.

SIR: I have this moment received information that Fort Meigs is again attacked, and by a considerable regular force. This must have been drawn from De Rottenberg's corps. His late insolence in pushing his small attacks to the very outline of your works has been intended to mask the weakness produced by this detachment. If, as you say, you can beat him, do it without delay; and remember, that, if you beat, you must destroy him. There is no excuse for a General who permits a beaten enemy to escape and to rally. These remarks grow out of some recent events in your quarter, and require no explanation. It is the President's wish that you should communicate fully and freely with Brigadier General Williams. It is only by this kind of intercourse that the efforts of all can be united in promoting the public good.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Brig. Gen. BOYD, Fort George.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General John P. Boyd to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,
July 27, 1813.

"I had the honor to address you last on the 24th instant. On the 22d instant, General Lewis and Commodore Chauncey were advised by me that, from intelligence received from Major Chapin and deserters, most of the enemy's captured ordnance, and their principal depot of ammunition, stores, &c., are at the head of the Lake. It was suggested that a small force might surprise, take, destroy, or bring them off, if part of the fleet might be allowed to assist in moving our troops.

"Yesterday the Lady of the Lake brought me a letter from Commodore Chauncey, stating that he approved of the enterprise, and would go himself with his fleet to the head of the Lake, and requested guides, information, &c. I have deemed it proper to detail a number of troops, under the command of Colonel Scott, which will embark on board the Lady of the Lake, with directions to join the squadron, which is believed to be now somewhere near Little York."

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Boyd to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT GEORGE, July 31, 1813.

"I had the honor to address you on the 27th instant. Agreeably to the plan therein suggested, Commodore Chauncey arrived here on the 28th instant, and received on board the fleet a body of men under the command of Colonel Scott. Light and contrary winds retard their progress up the Lake, but ere this the attack has probably been made on the head of the Lake. No information has as yet been received.

"The enemy has lately kept his Indians so constantly scouring the woods of our vicinity, that we gain no deserters nor intelligence of his movements."

Colonel Scott's Report.

FORT GEORGE, August 3, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to report that, in obedience to your orders, I proceeded on board the fleet with the detachment of troops under my command, destined to act against the enemy's post at the head of Little Lake, or Burlington bay; in sight of which place I arrived late in the evening of the 30th ultimo, the fleet having been greatly delayed by the almost constant calm which has prevailed since we sailed.

This delay of forty-eight hours, after our destination became obvious to the enemy, enabled him to anticipate our arrival by a reinforcement of 200 men from the nearest posts on this side of the Lake, of which we were early apprized. Nevertheless, Commodore Chauncey, with my concurrence, thought it advisable to land the detachment from the army, together with about 250 marines and seamen from the fleet, (making a total force of about 500 men.) The better to enable us to ascertain the exact force and position of the enemy's camp, the landing was made on the neck of land which nearly cuts off the Little Lake from Lake Ontario. From this point we could plainly discover the enemy's position on Burlington heights, surrounded on three sides by a creek, and in front of an entrenchment and a battery of seven pieces of cannon. The Little Lake or bay is, between those two points, six or seven miles across.

Perceiving the strength of the enemy's position, and learning from the inhabitants that the force on the heights, independent of the reinforcement above mentioned, was nearly equal to our own, the Commodore determined not to risk an attack, especially as our boats would have been greatly annoyed in the ascent towards the head of the bay by a small schooner of the enemy's, having on board one 18 pound carronade. The channel connecting the two Lakes did not afford water for the passage of either of our schooners. In the above opinion I fully concurred with the Commodore. It may be added, that the enemy received a further reinforcement of 400 men the same evening, by land, from Kingston.

On our return to this harbor, the fleet put into York, at which place we burnt the barracks and public stores, and brought off one piece of ordnance, (24 pounder,) eleven batteaux, and about 400 barrels of flour and hard bread. The barracks and stores had been repaired since the 27th May. Thirty or forty sick and wounded in hospital were paroled, and four prisoners (regulars) brought off. There had been no garrison at the place for the few days previous.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

W. SCOTT,

Colonel commanding detachment.

Brig. Gen. Boyd, Commanding, &c.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General John P. Boyd to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE, U. C.,

August 8, 1813.

"By Tuesday's mail I had the honor to receive your commands of the 30th instant, and yesterday a number of letters enclosed, which were delivered as directed.

"Conceiving myself at liberty to act offensively on the arrival of the fleet, an expedition was immediately concerted against the enemy, and acceded to by Commodore Chauncey. One thousand was to embark on board the fleet, under the command of Brigadier General Williams, to land at the head of the Lake. The army at this place was to move in two columns against the enemy's front, while General Williams assailed his rear, and cut off his retreat. Yesterday morning, the time when the troops were to have embarked, the enemy's fleet were discovered off this place.

"Commodore Chauncey weighed anchor, approached him, and by every indication that a leeward position would admit, offered to engage."

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,

August 12, 1813.

SIR: I had the honor to address you the 8th instant. Unfavorable winds continued to thwart the wishes of Commodore Chauncey to bring the enemy to action; and about the 9th instant he was so unfortunate as to lose, in a squall, two small schooners, which upset. On the night of the 10th a severe cannonade was heard on the Lake, which we ascertained, in the morning, resulted in the loss of two of our smallest schooners. Undiscouraged by these slight disasters

Failure of the Northern Army.

Commodore Chauncey is still in pursuit of the enemy, resolved to bring him to a general engagement. These circumstances have necessarily delayed the attack upon the enemy, which was contemplated in my last letter. General Porter is assembling a body of volunteers and Indians at Buffalo, with a view to co-operate in this enterprise. He will probably join us soon. Anything which can be done without the co-operation of the fleet shall be attempted. To attack the enemy, without being able to cut off his retreat, would be only beating without capturing him.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN P. BOYD,

Brigadier Gen'l Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GEORGE,

August 15, 1813.

SIR: I had the honor to address you on the 12th instant; since which time nothing of importance has occurred. Commodore Chauncey has left this part of the Lake, and the enemy have now so far the ascendancy as to render the proposed enterprise against his land force impracticable. Yesterday General Porter arrived at this place with a body of volunteers and Indians, which had been previously assembled at Buffalo. In the event of such an attack as was contemplated, this force would be of infinite service. At present they can only be employed to harass the enemy.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Letters from the Secretary of War to General Lewis, commanding at Sackett's Harbor.

Extracts of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Lewis, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 9, 1813.

"An order was expedited to General Dearborn, yesterday, permitting him to retire from the command of the army and district. Another was sent to Boyd, forbidding him to engage in any affair with the enemy that could be avoided, and subjecting him to the orders of Major General Hampton and of yourself. This last (for Hampton is now the oldest officer in the district) was intended to meet the contingency suggested in my last letter, viz: that if we regained the command of the Lake, and Yeo retired under the guns at Kingston, that this moment of superiority must not be lost, and that, bringing down Boyd's division, a blow might be struck at that place. To favor this enterprise, orders will be sent to General Hampton to push his headquarters to the position held by our army the last campaign on Lake Champlain; and a requisition for ten thousand militia from the States of New York and Vermont, in reinforcement of this part of the plan, will be superadded.

"The moment Chauncey gets out, our stores along the South shore of the Lake should be brought down to the harbor, and, in that case, your small posts (consisting of regular troops,) drawn into your main body."

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 3, 1813.

SIR: It is not merely possible, but probable, that the British fleet in Lake Ontario may, upon the fitting out of the General Pike, refuse a battle, and take shelter under the guns of Kingston, until their new brig shall restore to them the superiority. A question of much importance arises on this supposed state of things. What will be the best possible employment of our force during the period we may be able to command the Lake? Shall we reinforce the troops at Fort George from Sackett's Harbor, and cut off Vincent, or shall we bring from Fort George the mass of the division there, and, uniting them to your present command, attack the enemy at Kingston? If the latter part of the alternative be adopted, two things must be done. A heavy body of militia should be assembled at Ogdensburg, to draw to that point the enemy's attention, and General Hampton should move rapidly and in force against Montreal. Our assembled force at Sackett's Harbor would amount to seven thousand men, independently of the naval means. The enemy's land force at Kingston is about four thousand. Could a successful attack be made here, the fate of the campaign is decided—perhaps that of the war. The object is great; but, in proportion as it is so, the means of effecting it ought to be well considered. From the sketches I have been able to procure of Kingston, and its vicinity, I have no doubt but that the attack should be made on the works which cover the battery on Navy Point. These gained, town, battery, and harbor, are all at your discretion. Beware of dividing your attack; confine it to a single point, but let that point be a commanding one.

Believe me, General, very respectfully, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major Gen. LEWIS, Sackett's Harbor.

Correspondence between the Secretary of War and Major General Harrison.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Gen. William H. Harrison, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 5, 1813.

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your despatches of the 11th and 20th ultimo.

"The suspension of your movement in advance appears to have been necessary; but, though this may be the case, your demonstrations against Malden should not cease. These you will make in such way as shall be best calculated to keep up the enemy's alarm for the safety of that post, and of the ships of war wintering there. You will be more able to appreciate the value of this policy when I state, that we shall very soon be in motion on the Niagara and St. Lawrence.

Failure of the Northern Army.

"You did well in stopping the march of the two regiments from Ohio. To have added to your force, so long as your object is restricted to the maintenance of your present position, would have been a very useless expenditure of both public spirit and public money.

"As your campaign is now at an end, and yet nearly approached to that which is coming, it may be proper to communicate to you the President's views in relation to your subsequent movements.

"It would appear that Malden can only be successfully approached by the route you are now upon, at two seasons of the year—mid-Winter and mid-Summer. The former is gone, and to wait for the latter would be hardly less disastrous than defeat itself. What remains for us to do is, to keep our present ground till the Lake opens, and then to approach our object by water, and under convoy of the vessels of war building at Presque Isle. These will be afloat and ready to operate by the middle of May. By the same time boats for the transportation of the troops, a train of artillery, baggage, &c., may be constructed. Cleveland is believed to be the place best fitted for this purpose. It will also be made the depot for the troops to be employed on the expedition, which will be the 24th regiment now at Massac; and three of the twenty new regiments provided by an act of the session of Congress which closed yesterday. Two of these will be raised in the State of Ohio, and the third in that of Kentucky.

"Whatever these troops may fall short of the number and strength contemplated by the laws under which they shall be raised, must necessarily be made up from militia and volunteers; whence will arise the necessity of strictly attending to the progress of enlistments, so that, in the event of their failure, which may be readily foreseen, time may be left for resorting to the other expedient."

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 7, 1813.

SIR: Your letter of the 18th of February was, from some cause, delayed much beyond the usual course of the mail, and even some days after the receipt of your despatch of the 20th.

You will find, by my letter of the 5th instant, the plan prescribed for your part of the ensuing campaign; and, to prevent any ill effect arising from its miscarriage, a second copy is herewith enclosed. It is probable that Colonels McArthur and Cass will both be promoted to the rank of Brigadier, and will be assigned to the command of the two brigades intended to form your division of the army. In the enumeration of corps making parts of this division, I did not mention the two regiments of the line, the 17th and 19th, parts of which are already with you. The filling up of these would be an important service, and you are requested to promote it. If you are at ease with regard to the safety of your present post, against the attacks of the enemy, and have secured to yourself the means of subsisting it, there can be no motive for either reinforcing it by new draughts from the militia, or retiring from it. If, on the other hand, your force should be so reduced as to make your stay perilous, without a further reinforcement, you may employ the two regiments raised in Ohio, or so many of them as may be necessary to your object. If, again, the policy of adding to your force be forbidden, by the difficulty of subsisting it, and there arises a combination of both facts, viz: a want of force to maintain your present position, and a want of means to subsist a larger one, in that case, and in that alone, you will retire to the frontier settlements, and interpose the wilderness between you and the enemy.

These directions have not grown out of any suggestions to be found in your letters, but have been produced by a circumspection which it is always proper to extend beyond the mere limits of existing circumstances.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major Gen. W. H. HARRISON,
Franklinton, Ohio.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 9, 1813.

SIR: The Government have the intention of building a number of boats on Lake Erie, for the purpose of transporting troops on that Lake. Cleveland is the point farthest West, where any portion of these can be made with sufficient expedition. If the whole could be made there the better. These boats will be of the kind known by the name of Schenectady boats, narrow, and sharp ahead, and flat-bottomed. They will carry from forty to fifty men each, with their baggage, arms, and accoutrements, and provision for the voyage. It is proposed to commit the superintendence of this service to you, and to bestow upon you, pro hac vice, the staff appointment of Deputy Quartermaster General. If workmen cannot be found at Cleveland, and other places on the Lake, you will take them from Pittsburg. Such materials as you may want, other than those produced by the country itself, you will provide at Pittsburg, and have sent on without delay. Funds for this purpose will be put under your control, and you will be careful to make reports, weekly, of your progress.

Very respectfully, I am, sir, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Captain JESUP, Washington.

Extract of a letter from Major General William H. Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, CHILICOTHE,
March 17, 1813.

"The known candor of your character is a sufficient security for my receiving your pardon for the liberty I take in making objections to the plan of operations communicated in your letter of the 5th instant. If there is a positive certainty of our getting the command of Lake Erie, and having a regular force of three thousand five hundred, or even three thousand, well disciplined men, the proposed plan of setting out from Cleveland, and landing on the Northern shore, below Malden, would, perhaps, be the one by which that place and its dependencies could be most easily reduced. I am unacquainted with the extent of the preparations that are making to obtain the naval superiority upon Lake Erie; but should they fail, and the troops be assembled at Cleveland, it would be difficult to get again upon the proper track for making the attack round the head of the Lake. The attempt to cross the Lake from Cleveland should not be made with any other than well disciplined troops. A comparatively smaller number of men of this description could effect the object, and for those the means of conveyance might be obtained; but the means of transporting such an army as would be required, of militia, or undisciplined regulars, could not be procured. I can see no reason why Cleveland should be preferred as the point of embarkation for the troops, or the deposite of provisions and stores. These are already accumulated at the rapids of Miami, or in situations to be easily sent thither, to an amount nearly equal to the consumption of a protracted campaign. Although the expense and difficulty of transporting the provisions, artillery, and stores for an army, round the head of the Lake, would be very considerable, the Lake being possessed by our ships, and the heavy baggage taken in boats along its margin, the troops would find no difficulty in the land route. The force contemplated in your letter is, in my opinion, not sufficient to secure success. Admitting that the whole should be raised by the time pointed out, they would be very little superior to militia; the officers having, with scarcely an exception, to learn their duty before they could instruct their men; we have, therefore, no alternative, but to make up by numbers the deficiency in discipline.

Failure of the Northern Army.

"I am well aware of the intolerable expense which attends the employment of a large militia force. We are now, however, in a situation to avoid those errors which made that of the last campaign so peculiarly heavy. Our supplies are procured, and so deposited that the period for the march of the army from the advanced posts can be ascertained to an hour, and of course the troops need not be called out until the moment they are to act. Experience has convinced me that militia are more efficient in the early than in the latter part of their service. Upon the whole, it is my decided opinion that the rapids of Miami should be the point of rendezvous for the troops, as well as the principal depot. Indeed it must necessarily be the first deposite; the provisions for the army being so placed that they can be taken to the Lake in no other way. The artillery and a considerable supply of ammunition are already there. Boats and pirogues have been built in considerable numbers on the Auglaize and St. Mary's rivers, and every exertion is now making to increase them, intended for the double purpose of taking down the provisions to the rapids, and for coasting the Lake with the baggage of the army in its advance. I had calculated upon being able partially to use this mode of transportation, even if the enemy should continue their naval superiority on the Lake; but, with this advantage on our side, the whole baggage of the army could be safely and expeditiously carried along the coast in the boats and pirogues, which could be taken into the strait to transport the army to the Canada shore.

"As I have before observed, the army, unencumbered with heavy baggage, would find no difficulty in marching round the Lake at any season, but what the enemy would create, and we have the means of subsisting a force that would be irresistible.

"The objections to proceeding this way, stated in my letter to Colonel Monroe, arose from the time that would be necessary to construct boats after we should have arrived at the strait; but this objection is entirely obviated by our obtaining the command of the Lake, as the boats and pirogues built upon the Miami will answer the purpose. With regard to the quantum of force, my opinion is, that not only the regular troops designated in your letter, but a large auxiliary corps of militia should be employed. The only objection arises from the expensiveness of troops of that description. This, however, could not be an object, considering the very short time that it would be necessary to employ them. Let the moment for the commencement of the march from the rapids be fixed, and the militia might be taken to that point, proceed and accomplish the object, and return home in two months.

"Among the reasons which make it necessary to employ a large force, I am sorry to mention the dismay and disinclination to the service which appears to prevail in the Western country; numbers must give that confidence which ought to be produced by conscious valor and intrepidity, which never existed in any army in a superior degree than among the greater part of the militia which were with me through the Winter. The new draughts from this State are entirely of another character, and are not to be depended upon. I have no doubt, however, but a sufficient number of good men can be procured, and should they be allowed to serve on horseback, Kentucky would furnish some regiments that would be not inferior to those that fought at the river Raisin, and they were, in my opinion, superior to any militia that ever took the field in modern times. Eight troops of cavalry have been formed in Kentucky to offer me their service; and several of them were intended for twelve months' volunteers. Governor Shelby has some thoughts of taking the field in person—a number of good men will follow him. He thinks that an address from me to the people of the State would produce a good effect. I have strong objections to those addresses, but will, nevertheless, have recourse to one, should other means fail of bringing forward a sufficient force.

"Every exertion shall, in the meantime, be used, to forward the recruiting service; for a few weeks I think that my services would be more useful in that than any other employment."

W. H. HARRISON.

Failure of the Northern Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 4, 1813.

SIR: Your despatch of the 17th ultimo, from Chillicothe, has been received, and I hasten to repeat to you the views of the President, in relation to the next campaign, and the injunctions growing out of these with regard to the employment of militia, &c.

Our first object is to get a command of the Lakes. Means to accomplish this object have been taken, and we have the fullest assurance that, by the first day of June, it will be accomplished.

This fact assumed, there can be no longer a doubt by what means, or by what route, the division of the army assigned to you, ought to approach Malden. A passage by water will carry you directly to the fortress you would attack, without impairing your strength by fatigue, or diminishing it by battle. A passage by land will, on the other hand, call for great efforts, and expose you to great losses, which, if they do not destroy, will at least cripple you. The former will be easy, safe, and economical; the latter difficult, dangerous, and enormously expensive.

On the other supposition, that we fail to obtain the command of the Lake, a new question will arise: whether the campaign shall take an offensive or defensive character? Be this question determined as it may, the utmost extent which can be given to the force employed, will be seven thousand effectives.

Various reasons determine this point. The enemy have never had in the field, for the defence of Malden, more than two thousand men.

Their number has, no doubt, been hitherto limited by their means of subsistence, and this cause is not likely to suffer any very material change in their favor during the ensuing campaign. More than seven thousand men, therefore, would be unnecessary on our part. Again: to maintain a greater number would be impracticable in the present state of the Treasury.

It now remains only to signify to you, clearly and distinctly, the kind of force the Government mean hereafter to employ, in offensive operations, if it can be obtained.

When the Legislature, at their last session, adopted the measure of augmenting the Army to fifty-two regiments of the line, it was expressly in the view of superseding, hereafter, the necessity of employing militia, excepting in moments of actual invasion. In obedience to this policy, the President assigned to the eighth military district of the United States four of these new regiments, which, if filled, and superadded to the two regiments of the line now in that district, and the 24th, in march for it, will give a total of seven regiments, or seven thousand men. This number forbids the belief that any employment of militia draughts will be necessary, when it shall have been collected. Till, however, this be done, or, at least, till time be given for the experiment, so many militia only are to be called out as shall be necessary for the defence of your posts on the Miami, and of your depots of provision on the Lake. And, should the recruiting service go on less fortunately in the patriotic States of Kentucky and Ohio than in other parts of the Union, you are, in that case, and in that case only, authorized to call out so many militia draughts as will make good the deficiency, and, organizing these, under the rules already prescribed, await the further orders of the President in your camp at the Rapids.

To these orders I have to add, that you will regard it as your duty to keep this Department regularly and frequently informed of the actual condition of the troops under your command; as well in regard to equipment and supplies of provision and ammunition, as to number, discipline, and health; and that your weekly and monthly reports shall include, also, the state of the ordnance and quartermaster's departments, noting particularly the number of horses and oxen employed by both. You will readily perceive the necessity for giving this order, when I state that no return of any description, from your division of the army, has ever been received at the Adjutant General's office. Your proportion of the new staff has been given to you. Captain Adams has been appointed Assistant Adjutant General, and Mr. Bartlett, Deputy Quartermaster General of your division. The Brigadier Generals McArthur and Cass are employed in superintending the recruiting service. A letter from the latter gives reason to believe that this will go on well in the State of Ohio.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General HARRISON,
Commanding the 8th Military District.

Extracts of a letter from Major General Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, CAMP MEIGS,
April 21, 1813.

"The plan for future operations, as laid down in your letter of the 4th, is, no doubt, the best that could have been devised in the event of the promised naval success, and a prosperous issue to the recruiting business. My measures will, therefore be entirely directed to the prosecution of the campaign in that way.

"There is nothing to be feared as to the ulterior operations of the campaign.

"I shall cause the movements of the enemy to be narrowly watched; but, in the event of their landing at Lower Sandusky, that post cannot be saved. I will direct it, in such an event, to be evacuated. The stores there are not of much consequence, excepting about five hundred stands of arms, which I will cause to be removed as soon as the roads are practicable; at present it is impossible."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General William H. Harrison, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 8, 1813.

"Your letters of the 21st and 25th ultimo have been received. I never meant that you, or your artillery, or stores for the campaign, now collected at Fort Meigs, should be brought back to Cleveland for embarkation. My intention was, that the boats built there should move along the coast, in the wake of the fleet, to Sandusky, or to the very foot of the rapids, if that were practicable and expedient, taking in, on the route, what was wanted. The boats building and built by Major Jesup are not decked, but strong and high-sided, and very competent to the navigation of the Lake, particularly between the chain of islands and the west shore."

Failure of the Northern Army.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 21, 1813.

"Your future requisitions for ordnance stores will be governed by the quantity on hand at Fort Meigs and Franklinton, and by the number and calibers of the pieces you propose to take with you against Malden. Your whole train, if I am well informed, amounts to thirty-five pieces, of which nine are eighteen pounders.

"The 24th regiment was, on the 10th instant, at Lexington, (Kentucky,) on their way to Cleveland. You will give it any other point of rendezvous you may think proper, and adopt such means to assemble the other parts of your division as will be most advisable. On this head, I would but suggest, that the arrangement which shall best mask your real design, and most impress the enemy with a belief that your march to Malden will be by land, will be the best.

"Clothing for the 26th, 27th, and 28th regiments, has been forwarded from Philadelphia.

"The last accounts of the boats preparing by Major Jesup were favorable. That officer will, necessarily, report to you, and take your orders."

Extract of a letter from the same to the same.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 14, 1813.

"Orders have been sent to Captain Perry to communicate to you the naval movements, and to concert with you the necessary co-operations.

"Of the militia, you are authorized to take what, in your judgment, will be necessary. Such of the Kentucky militia as are in service would be better than a new draught. There is (of the Pennsylvania militia) one regiment at Erie, armed, equipped, &c. These are subjected to your command."

WAR DEPARTMENT, Aug. 5, 1813.

SIR: The best interpretation of the late movements of the enemy in your quarter, is, that De Routenberg has detached to the aid of Proctor between four and five hundred men, and that, with these, he is attempting to save Malden by attacking Fort Meigs. If this conjecture be well founded, it suggests the true policy on our part, provided the flotilla was over the bar. Go directly to Malden, and leave Mr. Proctor to amuse himself with Fort Meigs. There is no objection to your appointing the sergeants to other offices, pro tempore. Captain Butler has been appointed Major of the 32d regiment, and Lieutenant McGee, Captain in the 42d.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General HARRISON.

Extract of a letter from Major General William H. Harrison, to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, SENECA TOWN,
August 22, 1813.

"I am exerting every nerve to complete my preparations for crossing the Lake as soon as I am reinforced by two thousand of the Kentucky militia. That number is indispensable, from the sickly state of the regular troops, of whom I shall think myself fortunate to take with me two-fifths of the aggregate amount."

Extract of a letter from Major General Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, SENECA TOWN,
August 29, 1813.

"I shall be able to embark, some day between the 10th and 15th proximo, with upwards of 2,000 regular troops, and 3,000 militia. Every exertion has been, and is continued to be made, to prepare for the contemplated offensive operations; but, as we could not navigate the lake until our flotilla came up, nor accumulate at any point on its margin the stores that were at Upper Sandusky and Fort Winchester, during Proctor's late invasion, it will take the time I have mentioned before the embarkation can be effected. It might be facilitated by moving the troops that are here, immediately to the lake, and then waiting for the Kentucky militia. But so extremely unhealthy is the whole of the Southern shore, from Huron to the river Raisin, that the most fatal effects would follow the keeping the troops upon it, even for a few days. You can form a correct estimate of the dreadful effects of the immense body of stagnant water, with which the vicinity of the Lakes abounds, from the state of the troops at Lower Sandusky. Upwards of ninety are reported on the sick list, out of about two hundred and twenty. Those at Fort Meigs are not much better."

Extract of a letter from Major General William H. Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, BASS ISLAND,
September 22, 1813.

"The greater part of the troops are here with me, and the whole will, I believe, be up by twelve o'clock. I shall proceed as far as the Middle Sister, in the course of to-night and to-morrow, and, in the following night get so near the enemy's coast as to land two or three miles below Malden, by eight o'clock in the morning. These prospects may, however, be retarded by adverse winds. Commodore Perry gives me every assistance in his power, but his crews were so much cut up in the late action, that he cannot navigate his vessels without the aid of my men."

Failure of the Northern Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, SACKETT'S HARBOR,
September 22, 1813.

SIR: Information has reached me, through various but unofficial channels, that Commodore Perry had captured the whole of the British fleet on Lake Erie. If this be true, it is a matter of much personal and public congratulation. It enables you to make sure of Malden, and, as a subsequent measure, to carry your main body down to the lake, and by throwing yourself into De Rotenberg's rear, to compel him to quit his new positions before Fort George. After General Wilkinson shall have left that place, there will be found on the two sides of the Niagara a force amounting to three thousand men, who will be subjected to your orders. By giving this new direction to your operations, you will readily perceive of how much importance it is, in the opinion of the Executive, to be able to expel the enemy from the country lying between the two lakes, Erie and Ontario, than to pursue the Indians into their woody and distant recesses. A few days will put us in motion from this point.

Accept my best wishes, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

General HARRISON.

HEADQUARTERS, AMHERSTBURGH,
September 27, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that I landed the army under my command about three miles below this place, at three o'clock this evening, without opposition, and took possession of the town in an hour after. General Proctor has retreated to Sandwich, with his regular troops and Indians, having previously burned the fort, navy yard, barracks, and public store houses. The two latter were very extensive, covering several acres of ground. I will pursue the enemy to-morrow, although there is no probability of overtaking him, as he has upwards of 1,000 horses, and we have not one in the army. I shall think myself fortunate to be able to collect a sufficiency to mount the general officers. It is supposed here that General Proctor intends to establish himself upon the river French, forty miles from Malden.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. HENRY HARRISON.

JOHN ARMSTRONG, Esq., Sec'y War.

Extract of a letter from Major General William H. Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, MORAVIAN TOWN,
on the river Thames, Oct. 5, 1814.

"I have the honor to inform you that, by the blessing of Providence, the army under my command has, this evening, obtained a complete victory over the combined Indian and British forces, under the command of General Proctor. I believe that nearly the whole of the enemy's regulars are taken or killed; amongst the former are all the superior officers, except General Proctor. My mounted men are now in pursuit of him. Our loss is very trifling."

Extract of a letter from Major General Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, DETROIT, Oct. 16, 1813.

"A detachment of the army, under the command of Brigadier General McArthur, has been for some days waiting at this place for the necessary provisions to proceed to Lake Michigan. I am sorry to inform you, however, that, from the effects of a violent storm, there is now no prospect of accomplishing that desirable object, the reduction of Michilimackinac, this season. It with the greatest regret I inform you, that it is almost reduced to a certainty, that two of our schooners have been lost on Lake Erie, the Chipewa and Ohio; the former loaded with the baggage of the troops from Bass Island, the latter with flour and salt provisions from Cleveland."

"Upon a consultation with the two Brigadiers, and Commodore Perry and Captain Elliot, it was unanimously determined that the season is too far advanced to attempt an expedition to Mackinack, if it were not commenced in two or three days, and there was no hopes of supplies being obtained in that time.

"It is generally believed here, that General Proctor despatched an order to the commanding officer at Mackinack, to destroy the post, and retreat by the way of Grand River. At any rate, it is not a matter of much importance to have that place in our possession during the Winter, cut off as it is from a communication with the rest of the world."

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Oct. 20, 1813.

SIR: The enemy's corps before Fort George broke up their cantonments on the 9th, and marched rapidly for Burlington Bay, which he reached on the 11th. By taking this route he may intend to reinforce Proctor on the river French, or Kingston, at the head of the St. Lawrence. He was apprized of the abandonment of Malden on the fifth.

We are, perhaps, too remote to profit by each other's suggestions; but it does not appear to me that Sandwich is the point at which Proctor will stop, if you pursue him. From Point aux Pins, on Lake Erie, there is a good road, to Chatham, on the Thames; the distance is not more than twenty-four miles. Were this gained, and travelled back to Sandwich, the enemy's means for subsistence might be destroyed, and himself compelled to surrender. But of the practicability of this, you are the best judge. My opinion is suggested by the map.

The first division of this army sailed two days ago. The second and the reserve follow to-day.

Yours, with great respect,

J. ARMSTRONG.

Major General HARRISON.

Extract of a letter from Major General Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, ERIE, PA., Oct. 21, 1813.

"Soon after my letter to you of the 16th instant was written, I was informed that a special messenger, with despatches from you, had left Bass Island in the schooner Chippewa, which had been driven from the mouth of the Detroit river in a violent storm; and from the circumstance of a quantity of baggage, belonging to the officers, which was known to be on board, being found on the lake shore, she was believed to have been lost. As I had nearly completed the arrangement for a suspension of hostilities with the Indians, although I had no information as to the movement of the army on Lake Ontario, I determined to embark General McArthur's brigade, and the battalion of the United States' riflemen, and proceed with them down the lake, until I could receive some certain information of the movements of the army under General Wilkinson, and what was expected from me. I arrived here this morning, with Commodore Perry, in the Ariel, having left the remainder of the fleet at Bass Island. It is probable they will be here this evening, when we shall immediately proceed to Buffalo."

Failure of the Northern Army.

Extract of a letter from Major General Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated

"I have this moment landed at this place, from on board the schooner Ariel, which is one of the seven vessels with which I left Detroit, having on board the greater part of McArthur's brigade, and the detachment of United States' rifle regiment, under Colonel Smith. The other vessels are all, I believe, in sight, and will be up in a short time. The aggregate number of troops with me is about thirteen hundred, but not more than one thousand fit for duty. Before this reaches you, you no doubt will be informed of the loss of your messenger, Captain Brown, with the despatches that were intrusted with him. Not having received your directions, and being entirely ignorant of the state of our military operations in this quarter, I was much at a loss to know how to proceed; but believing that General Cass with his brigade would be able to secure Detroit, and our adjacent conquests, after having concluded an armistice with a greater part of the hostile tribes, I concluded that I could not do better than to move down the lake with the remaining part of the troops. A part of McArthur's brigade is still at Bass Island, where they were left for the want of means of conveyance; and a considerable portion of their baggage was also left from the same cause. Means, however, have been taken to collect, and bring them on.

"I shall move down the troops immediately to Fort George, where I shall await your orders unless an opportunity should previously occur of striking at the enemy. The information I have received here of the situation and movements of the enemy, on the head of Lake Ontario, is vague and contradictory."

WAR DEPARTMENT, WILNA, Oct. 30, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the fifth and of the twenty-fourth instant.

The despatch by Captain Brown, and which with him was lost in Lake Erie, suggested, as an ulterior movement, the coming down to the Niagara river, putting yourself on the right and rear of De Rottenberg's position before Fort George; while General McClure, with his brigade of militia, volunteers, and Indians, should approach them in front. The enemy seems to have been aware of this, or of some similar movement, as he began his retreat on the ninth, and did not stop until he had gained the head of Burlington Bay, where I understand, by report, he yet is. This is his last strong hold in the peninsula. Routed from this, he must surrender, or make his way down Lake Ontario to Kingston. His force is estimated at twelve or fifteen hundred effectives. The capture or destruction of this corps would be a glorious finale to your campaign. Our operations in this quarter are but beginning, at a time when they ought to have ended.

I shall go on slowly towards Utica, where I may have the pleasure of seeing Adjutant General Gaines.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to General Harrison, dated BOONSVILLE, November 3, 1813.

"I have fortunately met Colonel Gaines on the way to his regiment. The deputy paymaster shall have orders to attend to the brigade you have brought with you. Captain Butler will act as your Assistant Adjutant General, and shall receive an appointment as such. The officers of the several corps composing your division, (as well those at Fort George as of General Cass's brigade) not indispensable to the command of the troops now in the field, should be immediately despatched on the recruiting service. I need not invoke your attention to a subject so important to the early and successful opening of the next campaign, and to the extent and character of your particular command. Will the whole of Cass's brigade be wanted to the Westward? In the event of a peace with the savages, a less force will be sufficient; and to hasten and secure this event, the present impressions must be seized. Of the warriors suing for peace, one or more should be sent by the nearest route, and by the most expeditious mode, to the Creek Nation. The story of their defeat by you, and subsequent abandonment by the British, communicated by themselves, would probably have a decided effect on their red brethren of the South, and save us the trouble and expense of beating them into a sense of their own interest. When I wrote to you from Wilna, it was doubtful whether our attack would be made directly upon Kingston or upon Montreal. Reasons exist for our preferring the latter course, and have probably determined General Wilkinson to go down the St. Lawrence. In this case, the enemy will have, at Kingston,

Failure of the Northern Army.

besides his fleet, a garrison of twelve to fourteen hundred men. Had we not a corps in the neighborhood, these might do mischief, and even render insecure the Winter station of our fleet. To prevent this it is deemed advisable to draw together, at Sackett's Harbor, a considerable military force. There are now at that post between four and five hundred men of all descriptions—sick, convalescent, and effective. Colonel Scott's detachment (about seven hundred) are on their march thither; and it is barely possible that Colonel Randolph's (not arriving in time to move with the army) may be there also. This does not exceed three hundred and fifty. McArthur's brigade added to these, will make a force entirely competent to our object. To bring this brigade down the lake you must have the aid of the fleet, which will be readily given by Commodore Chauncey. On this point I shall write to him, and suggest a communication with you in relation to it.

"This new disposition will render necessary the employment of so many of the militia and volunteers, now in service under General McClure, as you may deem competent to the safe-keeping of Forts George and Niagara, and their dependencies."

HEADQUARTERS, NEWARK,
November 16, 1813.

SIR: Commodore Chauncey, with the fleet, arrived here yesterday morning, and informed me that he was ready to receive the troops to convey them down the Lake; and that the season was so far advanced, rendering the navigation dangerous to the smaller vessels, that it was desirable they should be embarked as expeditiously as possible. As a very small part of the militia and volunteers had arrived, and the situation of Sackett's Harbor appearing to me to require immediate reinforcement, I did not think proper to take upon myself the responsibility of postponing the departure of the troops for the lower part of the lake, conformably to the directions contained in your letter of the third instant.

The information I received yesterday from two respectable citizens, that were taken near Fort Meigs, in June last, and who made their escape in an open boat from Burlington, confirms me in the propriety of sending them off. These men state the troops were hurrying to Kingston from York as fast as possible. The regulars going down in boats, and the militia bringing the latter back.

The troops are now all embarked, and under the command of Colonel Smith, who is an officer in whose capacity and bravery the greatest reliance may be placed.

I shall set out this evening for the seat of Government.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your humble servant,

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

Hon. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

Correspondence with Governor Shelby in relation to the Northwestern campaign.

FRANKFORT, August 1, 1813.

SIR: A few days ago I was honored with a letter from General Harrison, under date of the 20th ultimo, by his Aid-de-camp, Major Trimble. In it he says, that "he had just received a letter from the Secretary of War, authorizing him to call from the neighboring States such numbers of militia as he might deem requisite for the ensuing operations against Upper Canada." In pursuance of that power, he has made a requisition on the Government of Kentucky for reinforcements, and has referred me to Major Trimble for information, &c., and has, in warm terms, solicited my taking the field in person. Much delay would have been the inevitable consequence of ordering out the militia as infantry, in the ordinary mode, by draught. As mounted volunteers, a competent force can, I feel confident, be easily raised. I have, therefore, appointed the 31st of this month, at Newport, in this State, for a general rendezvous of mounted volunteers.

I have the honor of enclosing, for the information of the President, a copy of my address to the militia of this State on the occasion.

The prospect of acting efficiently against Upper Canada will, I have no doubt, call forth a large force to our standard, and they will be immediately marched to the headquarters of the Northwestern army, in such bodies as will best facilitate their movements; when there they can act as foot or mounted, as circumstances may require.

I shall take great pleasure to hear from the President on this subject, previous to my departure from this place, and I request the favor of you to lay this letter immediately before him for his consideration, and that you will be pleased to apprise me of the result by the earliest conveyance.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

ISAAC SHELBY.

Hon. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

RED HOOK, NORTH RIVER,
August 21, 1813.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your Excellency's letter of the 1st of August, by the Southern mail of yesterday, and of learning from the War Office that a copy of it had been forwarded to the President for his consideration and orders. These will be communicated to your Excellency as promptly as possible.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

His Ex'cy the GOVERNOR OF KENTUCKY.

NOTE.—It is understood that it was not until the receipt of the above at the War Office, for transmission to Kentucky, that Governor Shelby's letter was sent to the President.

Failure of the Northern Army.

WAR OFFICE, September 27, 1813.

SIR: In the absence of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to inform your Excellency that the President has been pleased to approve your arrangements, in substituting volunteers for the detached militia required by General Harrison.

The term of service for the detachment under your Excellency must depend on the arrangements of the commanding General, to whom you are referred for the necessary information relative to their duty, and the points where your troops will be expected to operate.

It will be proper for your Excellency to keep up a correspondence with General Harrison. This is rendered the more necessary, as the several requisitions which have been made by him for volunteers and militia have not been accurately reported to the War Office; and it is possible he may find it advisable to discharge a part of your force before they reach the frontier.

In the present critical period of the campaign, it seems advisable to submit all further arrangements to General Harrison, under the instructions he has received from the President through the Secretary of War.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,

DANIEL PARKER,

C. C. War Department.

HIS EX'CY ISAAC SHELBY,
Governor of Kentucky.

Correspondence between the Secretary of War and Major General Hampton.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1813.

DEAR SIR: Prevost has gone up to the head of the Lake; Yeo has followed him. The object is either to attack Boyd, or to draw Wilkinson to the West, and spin out the campaign, without either giving or receiving blows of decided character. In either case, his [Prevost's] rear is manifestly neglected, and we must not lose the advantage he presents for attacking it. Wilkinson has gone on to Fort George to baffle Prevost, (if the former be his object,) and to bring off the army, should the other be manifestly his intention. If Chauncey beat Yeo, Sir George's case will be desperate. This is the pivot on which the issue of the campaign turns.

I am, dear sir, yours, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

CAMP, NEAR BURLINGTON,
September 7, 1813.

SIR: Your letter of the 1st instant came to hand by express last evening. My dispositions for a movement had been shaped to meet the arrangement communicated in my letter of the 31st ultimo; but I called together the Heads of Departments this morning to know how far it would be practicable to anticipate that which you had indicated in your despatch of the 29th, and it was found impracticable.

Learned's regiment has not arrived. The ordnance and fixed ammunition belonging to the artillery were only to leave Albany on the fifth, and the latter for the infantry is not yet on its way, notwithstanding my order to Major Bomford, as early as the 12th or 15th of August; and without it I shall be fifty rounds a man short, having now less than fifty, including those in the cartridge boxes. But what is worse than all, the Quartermaster General's arrangement for the land transportation is shaped to the 20th, and cannot be met at an earlier day.

A descent by water, and direct attack on the Isle aux Noix, is out of the question. It is a place of immense strength, and cannot be approached but by a decided superiority of naval strength. This Commodore McDonough does not pretend to assume in the narrow waters. He has this morning been explicitly consulted upon that point. Our approach must be by the Plains of Acadia. I have directed a monthly return to be enclosed. Our strength will be less than 4,000 effectives. Lane and Leonard's regiments have come on, with mumps and measles upon them, and totally destitute of the least instruction. Too much must not be expected from us. All accounts concur in representing the force of the enemy at more than 5,000, exclusive of three battalions of incorporated militia (twelve months' men) stationed at the Cedars and Cascades, some distance up the St. Lawrence. If any have gone to Kingston, they have been detached from these points. These battalions consist of 400 men each.

I shall expect information from you respecting the state of things above, but shall not wait a moment for it after I am ready.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

W. HAMPTON.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Sept. 13, 1813.

SIR: Your letter of the 7th instant has been received. Chauncey probably fought a battle on the 11th instant. A heavy cannonade was distinctly heard at this place for several hours, and a boat from Great Sodus states that an engagement between the fleets took place off Presque Isle, on the northern shore of the Lake. (Presque Isle is nearly opposite to Great Sodus.) We are anxiously looking for the result. Had Chauncey been beaten, or so crippled as to make it necessary for him to go into port, we should have seen him here before to-day. His absence and his silence gives us, therefore, an assurance that whatever may have been the issue of the battle, it has not disabled him from covering the intended movement of the troops.

Our information differs widely from yours as to the strength of the enemy at Montreal and its dependencies. A deserter from a British detachment of three hundred men, moving from Montreal to Kingston, and who left them near the head of the rapids, came to this post the day before yesterday. He states that the whole regular force near Montreal does not exceed one thousand effectives, and that but three hundred invalids have been left at Quebec. This agrees with information received through other channels less direct, and perhaps less correct than yours.

From General Wilkinson I have not heard a syllable since his arrival at Fort George, which was on the 4th instant. He must now be on the point of moving.

The 10th and 32d regiments are in march for Plattsburg. The latter was destined for this place, but learning that it could not leave Philadelphia before the 12th, I have given to it the shorter march and nearer scene of action.

It is much to be regretted that our naval means on Lake Champlain should have fallen so far short of their object. To our operations an ascendancy in the narrow parts of the Lake is of infinite moment. A well chosen position on the plains is the alternative of most promise. It may keep the different corps of the enemy in a state of separation.

With great respect, I am, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General HAMPTON.

HEADQUARTERS, CUMBERLAND HEAD,
September 15, 1813.

SIR: I have got my forces nearly concentrated at this point; and, with McDonough's aid, have put a stopper on the lake, which insures tranquillity while my operations are going on. All now depends on the Quartermaster General, and I believe he will surmount every obstacle. I shall soon be ready. I am, &c.

WADE HAMPTON.

HON. SECRETARY OF WAR.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Sept. 19, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: Chauncey has chased Yeoo round the lake, and obliged him to take shelter in Kingston. The Commodore has now gone up to Fort George to bring down the troops. We are ready at this point to embark. It may, perhaps, be the 30th before our forces will be assembled and in motion. Your movements may of course be somewhat delayed; say to the 25th or 26th.

It is believed in Kingston that Sir George Prevost is about going to Quebec. Will he not stop at Montreal? Yours, faithfully,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

General HAMPTON.

HEADQUARTERS, LITTLE CHAZEY,
September 22, 1813.

SIR: At 6 o'clock, P. M., on the 19th, I dropped down with the army from Cumberland Head for the shore near this place, and landed at 12 o'clock at night, and an hour after had the light corps of the army in motion against the advanced posts of the enemy—Snelling's command against a post a little over the line, on the lake shore, and Hamilton's against Odletown. The blow was to have been struck at the dawn, and the corps were to unite at the latter place, twelve miles distant. Both corps were misled by their guides. Snelling finding himself out of his way for the first point, pushed for the second; and as Hamilton had taken a circuit to get below it, Snelling arrived first and fell upon the picket in a house, which he killed or took, except two or three, and the main body escaped.

Hamilton arrived soon after; the army joined them a little after nine. A few desperate Indians continued to lurk about the distant bushes, and frequently crawled up and fired upon our sentries during the day and the succeeding night.

One was killed on his post in the dark, and two or three others wounded. They were frequently drove off and the thickets scoured, but they continued to hover around as long as we staid. The army had on their backs five days' provisions, and my intention was to push through the wood, remove all obstructions, and repair the roads for our supplies, artillery, baggage, &c., which was to follow; but an insurmountable difficulty occurred, which at once defied all human exertion: the drought had been uncommon, and I had some doubts of the practicability of procuring water for the troops, horses, and teams; but the points of Odletown, La Cole, and the river La Cadia, were represented to me as a sure resource.

The troops, however, soon dried up the wells and springs of Odletown, and the beds of La Cole and La Cadia are represented, from an authority not to be questioned, to be dry. The troops began to suffer extremely, and the few cavalry and artillery horses that arrived were obliged to be sent back to Champlain, a distance of four miles, for water. The difficulty began to produce effects the most to be dreaded.

It was not a time to hesitate. The general staff and commanding officers of the corps were called together, and there was but one voice.

The Chataugay route was adopted. It was circuitous, but afforded water, and was practicable in less time, all obstructions in the other considered.

The army fell back in the afternoon of the 21st, and encamped at Champlain. The Chataugay road takes off near this place, and the army will advance on it seven miles this afternoon. The baggage is now advancing on it. I hope to arrive at Chataugay on the evening of the 24th. I can from thence join you at any point you may advise on the St. Lawrence. My object is Cognawaga, opposite to La Chine, about forty miles from Chataugay, and ten from Montreal. I have my guides, and information I can rely upon. This position will present three points. If I do not hear from you I can take either, or hold fast, as circumstances shall indicate.

My first movement was unexpected to the enemy; must draw him into some confusion; and will pass as a feint so soon as he hears of my route to Chataugay. My force is less numerous than I expected. It is raw, and of a description that will be forever falling off. All I can say, is, it shall have all the capacity I can give it.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant.

W. HAMPTON.

P. S. Since writing I find that all the corps cannot leave this ground before morning, and that it will be the 25th before we reach Chataugay.

HON. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Sept. 25, 1813.

SIR: Your letter of the 22d instant was delivered to me last night. Commodore Chauncey left this place on the 18th, in the intention of running up to Fort George, and covering the transportation of the troops from that point to this. On the twenty-first he had not arrived there; the effect, I suppose, of adverse winds. This circumstance will necessarily bring after it a delay in the execution of our joint operations, and will indicate the propriety of your not advancing beyond Malone, or the Four Corners, until you have advice of our movement. The distance from this place to Malone is about one hundred and thirty miles. An express can reach you in thirty hours, and will, of course, enable you to gain the village of Cognawaga as early as may be proper. You will give such direction to the militia corps assembling or assembled at Plattsburg as you may think most advisable.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General HAMPTON.

HEADQUARTERS, POMEROY'S,

13 miles from Chataugay, Sept. 25, 1813.

SIR: I had this morning, at three o'clock, the honor to receive your letter of the 19th, and finding so much time on my hands, the idea has occurred, that a great advantage may arise from a closer view of our means, and the clearest possible concert and understanding in their application. Of every matter and thing, relating to mine, Colonel Atkinson will give you as full an idea as if you had been with me for the last five days. When you shall have reflected fully upon them, my arrangements and ideas, your indications can be made with more precision and confidence.

The perfect rawness of the troops, with the exception of not a single platoon, has been a source of much solicitude to the best informed among us. This solicitude has not been removed by the first experiment. Everything was done, to be sure, that ought to have been done; but not in that style which the example of a Snelling, a Hamilton, &c., ought to have inspired in the movements of even the light corps. We want a little more mercury, in the ranks, at least. Can you let me have the first dragoons, and one more veteran battalion? At all events let me have Hane and Haig, that I may have their local as well as their constitutional ardor.

But the great object of this letter is, a full and distinct view and understanding on both sides. All I need say is, that whatever part shall be assigned to me, in the general plan, shall be executed to the utmost extent of my ability and power.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

W. HAMPTON.

HON. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Hampton, dated WAR DEPARTMENT, Sept. 28, 1813.

The position you have taken is better calculated to keep up the enemy's doubts, with regard to your real point of attack, than any other. Hold it fast till we approach you. In the present state of the campaign we ought to run no risks by separate attacks, when combined ones are practicable and sure. Had you been able to have broken down the head of their defences, and seized the banks of the St. Johns at the Rapids, you would have bothered his Knightship considerably; but, on the whole, the Western movement is to be preferred, because in it there is safety and concert, and in the meantime enough to render his attention to different points necessary, and of course to keep his forces in a state of division.

The moment the enemy left the upper parts of the Chesapeake, I ordered Pickens, with his battalion of the tenth, to join you. A battalion of the thirty-second has similar orders.

HEADQUARTERS, CHATAUGAY,

October 4, 1813.

DEAR SIR: No change of importance in my affairs has occurred since my last, by Colonel Atkinson; but, as there are several of minor consideration, I have judged that a detailed view of them might be of some use, at the moment of your arranging, with our commanding General, the main case of the proposed operations.

The road to Plattsburg will be completed to-day, and is a perfect turnpike. The artillery, consisting of eight six-pounders, one twelve, and one howitzer, tolerably appointed and found, has arrived. I have but a small stock of provisions on hand, but have the most pointed assurance from Colonel Thomas, the Quartermaster General, that a supply of sixty days of bread and flour will arrive, at once, in the course of three or four days. I have only from forty to fifty rounds of musket cartridges with me, but this convoy will make the supply an hundred, and give to the artillery all it requires in reserve. The supply of salted provisions will not exceed one fourth of the proportion of flour; but we have, and can have, an unlimited supply of good beef cattle. Brigadier General Parker is at Plattsburg, hastening my supplies, and presiding over some arrangements that were thought necessary. I have directed the commencement of a petty war, or invasion of the lines, at and near Lake Champlain, by Colonel Clark, who has some volunteers, and

Failure of the Northern Army.

Brigadier General Fasset, (our colonel,) who has, at my instance, called out his brigade of militia. The latter, I understand, turn out but badly; but they will make together, I suppose, from six hundred to a thousand men. There has been inculcated, by the artifices of the British, a shameful and corrupt neutrality on the lines, for the purpose of gain. I have directed these officers to break the truce; and, should other means fail, to act the part of the mischievous urchin, who, to get two peaceable tabbies at "making the fur fly," held them up together by the tails. To be serious, it is really time each individual shall take his side, and that traitors to either should meet their due reward. What I am aiming at, however, is tranquillity on the road, by kicking up a dust on the lines. It will also create a division at a proper point. Of Hopkins's militia, but about two hundred and fifty have arrived, and not more than fifty or sixty of them have consented to pass the line. Such as refused, General Parker was authorized to keep on the lines below, and to excite all the alarm he could, with them and the Vermonters. The change of habits has produced more sickness among my raw soldiers than I expected. I believe the number has accumulated at this place to three hundred, and I am afraid will increase. The enemy is in considerable force, about twelve or fourteen miles distant. He made an attack on one of my outposts, with three or four hundred regulars, and as many Indians, on the afternoon of the first instant, but he fell into bad hands. He found Saelling well posted with his own and Wool's corps. The attack was made with the Indians, and the regulars lay in ambush; but Snelling dashed upon them with such rapidity upon their flanks, that they all scampered away together. Lieutenant Nash, of the thirty-third regiment, and one man, were killed, and one wounded. If the Indians lost any, they carried them off.

The Indians still hover about us, and shoot at our sentries. The St. Regis people are poor d—ls.

I have written in much haste, and have neither time for correction nor copying. You must take it for better or for worse. I will only entreat you to regard it in any other light than that of an official communication. You may, however, no less rely upon all the information it conveys.

I am, sir, very respectfully and truly, your obedient humble servant,

W. HAMPTON.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG.

HEADQUARTERS, CHATAUGAY,
October 12, 1813.

DEAR SIR: My solicitude to know your progress, and the real state of the grand army, is extreme. It is, perhaps, not less necessary for both, that I should be constantly informed. Implicit faith, cordiality, and concert, ought to unite our efforts. These have formed the basis of our exertions so far, and promises, more than our numbers, the result so much desired. I have no reference to individuals; but to the heart of every man. The point and movement of our junction is all important: and that, and not the moment of my departure from hence, ought to be indicated; because I ought to be the best judge of the time necessary to surmount the obstacles in the way. Between this and Cognawaga, much work on the road is necessary, and I ought to advance upon it two or three days earlier than might be judged necessary on a smooth and solid road. By seizing and holding strong positions in my front, the work could progress in my rear, without incurring risk, until I arrived within a striking distance. You have said "hold fast," and it might be considered precipitate to advance before I hear, at least, that the Rubicon is passed above. These are points for your consideration, and those with you who guide the general movement. You have not sent me the two hundred mounted dragoons. Their presence, on ground the possession of which I do not despair of gaining, added to a force of four thousand effective infantry, and a well appointed train, ought to inspire you with some reliance upon our army, new as it is. High pretensions have been avoided; but the moment has arrived when it is, perhaps, necessary for us to be estimated at as much as we are worth.

The tenth is at hand, and is included in the estimate. It is believed the militia may serve for escorts to what must follow us.

Colonel Clark is carrying on his small war, on the lines, with all the effect contemplated. The enemy's motley force have every where nearly disappeared. He is concentrating, no doubt, on points in my way, or on the river.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully and truly, your obedient servant,

W. HAMPTON.

Gen. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

We had an intelligent deserter of the regiment of Canadian fencibles. He states the enemy's force near us, at three thousand men; but, when put to the detail, gave it as follows:

Thirteenth regiment—two flank companies and part of a battalion	300
Muron's French regiment, two flank companies	200
Canadian fencibles, Colonel Robinson	150
Colonel Shaburby's command, voltigeurs and Indians, and some fencibles	700
Two battalions of incorporated militia	750

The whole commanded by Col. Williams 2,110

Sir George had gone along to Montreal. He brought down thirty-six boats and about six hundred troops, included in the above.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Oct. 16, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: Your favor of the twelfth ultimo has been handed to me by Major Parker. The Niagara division has been slow in its movements. It has at length reached Henderson's harbor, and moves this day to Grenadier Island, whither the division here is moving also. From this point (Grenadier Island) we take our departure either for Kingston or for Montreal. The enemy broke up his positions before Fort George on the ninth, burned his surplus stores, arms, &c., and moved rapidly for Burlington Bay, which he reached on the eleventh instant. Advices from the Bay of Canti state, that he is coming down to Kingston, and that his sick and convalescent, to the number of one thousand two hundred, had already arrived there. He will bring with him about one thousand five hundred effectives, and, thanks to the storm and our snail-like movements down the lake, they will be there before we can reach it. The manœuvre intended is lost, so far as regards Kingston. What we now do against that place must be done by hard blows, and at some risk. The importance of the object may, however, justify the means. In the other case, (an immediate descent of the St. Lawrence,) the army will make its way to the Isle Perott, whence we shall immediately open a communication with you. Under these circumstances you will approach the mouth of the Chateaugay, or other point which shall better favor our junction, and hold the enemy in check. Your known vigilance and skill make it unnecessary to suggest any measures of precaution against the enterprises of the enemy, while you remain within stroke of him. The dragoons will pass the St. Lawrence near the Coteau de Lac.

Yours, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General HAMPTON.

HEADQUARTERS, FOUR CORNERS,
November 1, 1813.

SIR: On the morning of the 21st ultimo the army commenced its movement down the Chateaugay, for the purpose of placing itself in a situation which would enable it to fulfil its part of the proposed combined operations on the St. Lawrence.

An extensive wood of eleven or twelve miles in front, blocked up with felled timber, and covered by the Indians and light troops of the enemy, was a serious impediment to the arduous task of opening a road for the artillery and stores. Brigadier General Izard, with the light troops and one regiment of the line, was detached early in the morning to turn these impediments in flank, and to seize on the more open country below, while the army, preceded by a strong working party, advanced on a more circuitous but practicable route for a road. The measure, as will be seen by the report of Brigadier General Izard, which I have the honor to enclose, completely succeeded, and the main body of the army reached the advanced position on the evening of the 22d. The 23d and 24th were employed in completing the road and getting up the artillery and stores.

I had arranged, at my departure, under the direction of Major Parker, a line of communication as far up the St. Lawrence as Ogdensburg, for the purpose of hastening to me the earliest notice of the progress of our army down. I had surmounted twenty-four miles of the most difficult part of the route, and had in advance of me seven miles of open country, but, at the end of that distance, commenced a wood of some miles in extent, which had been formed into an entire abbatiss, and filled by a succession of wooden breastworks, the rearmost of which were supplied with ordnance. In front of these defences were placed the Indian force and light corps of the enemy, and in the rear all his disposable force. As the extent of this force depended upon his sense of danger on the St. Lawrence, it was a cause of regret that all communication from yourself or Major Parker seemed to be at an end. As it was, however, believed that the enemy was hourly adding to his strength in this position, if free from apprehension of danger from above, an effort was judged necessary to dislodge him, and, if it succeeded, we should be in possession of a position which we could hold as long as any doubts remained of what was passing above, and of the real part to be assigned us.

Our guides assured us of a shoal and practicable fording place, opposite the lower flank of the enemy's defences, and that the wood on the opposite side of the river, a distance of seven or eight miles, was practicable for the passage of the troops. Colonel Purdy, with the light corps, and a strong body of infantry of the line, was detached at an early hour of the night of the 25th, to gain this ford by the morning, and to commence his attack in rear, and that was to be the signal for the army to fall on in front, and it was believed the pass might be carried, before the enemy's distant troops could be brought forward to its support.

I had returned to my quarters from Purdy's column, about nine o'clock at night, when I found a Mr. Baldwin, of the Quartermaster General's department, who put into my hand an open paper, containing instructions to him from the Quartermaster General, respecting the building of huts for the army in the Chateaugay, below the line. This paper sunk my hopes, and raised serious doubts of receiving that efficacious support which had been anticipated. I would have recalled the column, but it was in motion, and the darkness of the night rendered it impracticable. I could only go forward. The army was put in motion on the morning of the 26th, leaving its baggage, &c. on the ground of encampment.

On advancing near the enemy, it was found that the column on the opposite side was not so far advanced as had been anticipated. The guides had misled it, and finally failed in finding the ford. We could not communicate with it, but only waited the attack below. About two o'clock the firing commenced, and our troops advanced rapidly to the attack. The enemy's light troops commenced a sharp fire, but Brigadier General Izard advanced with his brigade, drove him everywhere behind his defences, and silenced the fire in his front. This brigade would have pushed forward as far as courage, skill, and perseverance, could have carried it; but, on advancing, it was found that the firing had commenced on the opposite side, and the ford had been gained.

The enemy retired behind his defences, but a renewal of his attack was expected, and the troops remained some time in their position to meet it. The troops on the opposite side were excessively fatigued. The enterprise had failed in its main point, and Colonel Purdy was ordered to withdraw his column to a shoal four or five miles above, and cross over. The day was spent, and General Izard was ordered to withdraw his brigade to a position three miles in the rear, to which place the baggage had been ordered forward.

The slowness and order with which General Izard retired with his brigade, could but have inspired the enemy with respect. They presumed not to venture a shot at him during his movement; but the unguardedness of some part of Purdy's command exposed him to a rear attack from the Indians, which was repeated after dark, and exposed him to some loss. These attacks were always repelled, and must have cost the enemy as many lives as we lost. Our entire loss of killed, wounded, and missing, does not exceed fifty. In its new position, within three miles of the enemy's post, the army encamped on the night of the 26th, and remained until 12 o'clock of the 28th. All the deserters, of whom there were four, having concurred in the information that Sir George Prevost, with three other general officers, had arrived with the whole of his disposable force, and lay in the rear of these defences, and a letter from Major Parker (by express, received on the evening of the 26th) having informed me that no movements of our army down the St. Lawrence had been heard of at Ogdensburg, and for some distance above, the following questions were submitted to the commanding officers of brigades, regiments, and corps, and the heads of the general staff, in a council convened for the purpose: "Is it advisable, under existing circumstances, to renew the attack on the enemy's position, and, if not, what position is it advisable for the army to take, until it can receive advices of the advance of the grand army down the St. Lawrence?" The opinion of the council was expressed in the following words: "It is the unanimous opinion of this council, that it is necessary, for the preservation of this army and the fulfilment of the ostensible views of the Government, that we immediately return by orderly marches to such a position (Chateaugay) as will secure our communications with the United States, either to retire into Winter quarters, or be ready to strike below." In pursuance of this opinion, the army has returned by slow marches to this place, and now awaits the orders of the Government. Its condition will be stated by the bearer, Colonel King, who can give you, upon every point, more full and perfect information than could be contained in a written detail.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

W. HAMPTON.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,

District No. 9, Nov. 6, 1813, in the evening.

SIR: I address you at the special instance of the Secretary of War, who, by bad roads, worse weather, and ill health, was diverted from meeting me near this place, and determined to tread back his steps to Washington from Antwerp on the 28th ultimo.

I am destined to, and determined on the attack of Montreal, if not prevented by some act of God; and, to give security to the enterprise, the division under your command must co-operate with the corps under my immediate orders. The point of rendezvous is the circumstance of greatest interest to the issue of this operation, and the distance which separates us, and my ignorance of the practicability of the direct or devious roads or routes on which you must march, make it necessary that your own judgment should determine that point. To assist you in forming the soundest determination, and to take the most prompt and effectual measures, I can only inform you of my intentions and situation in one or two respects of first importance. I shall pass Prescott to night, because the stage of the season will not allow me three days to take it; I shall cross the cavalry at Hambleton, which will not require a day, and shall then press forward and break down every obstruction to the confluence of this river with Grand river, there to cross to the isle Perrot, and with my scows to bridge the narrow inner channel, and thus obtain a foothold on Montreal island, at about twenty miles from the city; after which, our artillery, bayonets, and swords, must secure our triumph, or provide us honorable graves. Enclosed you have a memorandum of my field and battering train, pretty well found in fixed ammunition, which may enable you to dismiss your own, but we are deficient in loose powder and musket cartridges, and therefore hope you may be abundantly found. On the subject of provisions, I wish I could give as favorable information; our whole stock of bread may be computed at about fifteen days, and our meat at twenty. In speaking on this subject to the Secretary of War, he informed me that ample magazines were laid on Lake Champlain, and, therefore, I must request you to order forward two or three months' supply, by the safest route, in a direction to the proposed scene of action. I have submitted the state of our provisions to my general officers, who unanimously agree that it should not prevent the progress of the expedition, and they also agree in opinion that, if you are not in force to face the enemy, you should meet us at St. Regis or its vicinity.

I shall expect to hear from, if not to see you, at that place, on the 9th or 10th instant,

And have the honor to be, respectfully, &c.

JAMES WILKINSON.

To Major General W. HAMPTON, &c.

P. S. I was preparing an express, which I should have despatched to-morrow, but for the fortunate call of Colonel King.

Failure of the Northern Army.

HEADQUARTERS, FOUR CORNERS,
November 8, 1813.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, at a late hour last evening, by Colonel King, your communication of the 6th, and was deeply impressed with the sense of responsibility it imposed, of deciding upon the means of our co-operation.

The idea, suggested as the opinion of your officers, of effecting the junction at St. Regis, was most pleasing, as being the most immediate, until I came to the disclosure of the amount of your supplies of provision. Colonel Atkinson will explain the reasons that would have rendered it impossible for me to have brought more than each man could have carried upon his back; and, when I reflected that, in throwing myself upon your scanty means, I should be weakening you in your most vulnerable point, I did not hesitate to adopt the opinion, after consulting the general and principal officers, that, by throwing myself back on my main depot, where all the means of transportation had gone, and falling upon the enemy's flank, and straining every effort to open a communication from Plattsburgh to Cognawaga, or any other point you may indicate on the St. Lawrence, I should more effectually contribute to your success than by the junction at St. Regis.

The way is, in many places, blockaded and abatised, and the road impracticable for wheels during Winter; but, by the employment of pack horses, if I am not overpowered, I hope to be able to prevent your starving.

My troops and other means will be described to you by Colonel Atkinson. Besides their rawness and sickness, they have endured fatigues, equal to a Winter campaign, in the late snows and bad weather, and are sadly dispirited, and fallen off; but, upon this subject, I must refer you to Colonel Atkinson.

With these means, what can be accomplished by human exertion I will attempt, with a mind devoted to the general objects of the campaign.

W. HAMPTON.

To Major General WILKINSON.

A copy. JOHN HOOMES, A. D. C.

HEADQUARTERS, PLATTSBURG,
November 12, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose the copy of a letter I have received from General Wilkinson, and of my reply. The forage at Chateaugay had been nearly consumed before the expedition down the river; and, in the return of the army, enough only could be found to subsist the horses and teams two or three days. All accounts concurred in the report, that General Wilkinson had not commenced his operations against Kingston, and that no descent down the river was intended. Hence, the necessity for sending off the cavalry artillery, and provision teams, to Plattsburg, for subsistence; and hence, also, the impossibility of a junction at St. Regis with no more provisions than must have been consumed on the march to that place. General Wilkinson had no spare transportation for us; and the junction would have reduced the stock of provisions to eight or ten days for the whole. The alternative was adopted under the impression of absolute necessity.

The army has approached on this route to the road leading to Chazey, a few miles from the lines, where I shall join it to-night. I can only repeat what I said in my letter to General Wilkinson, "that what can be accomplished by human exertion shall be attempted, to meet the objects of the campaign." But I should be uncandid not to own that many circumstances are unpropitious. The force is dropping off by fatigue and sickness to a most alarming extent. My returns yesterday report the effectives at little more than half their original state at Chateaugay; and, what is more discouraging, the officers, with a few honorable exceptions, are sunk as low as the soldiers, and endure hardship and privation as badly. In a word, since the show, produced by clothing, movements, &c., has worn off, all have assumed their native rawness. Fatigue and suffering from the weather have deprived them of that spirit which constituted my best hopes. What confidence can the best officer (and I have a few surpassed by none) feel, under such circumstances? It is painful to hold up to you this picture, but it is but too faithfully drawn.

The Quartermaster General has been ordered to procure, on hire, four hundred wagons, and I shall attempt to open a communication on the direct route from the town of Champlain. Success, under the circumstances I have mentioned, must depend upon the efforts and force opposed to me. The demonstration, however, can but produce a partial good.

On the route I took, the enemy burnt and consumed everything before him; and this I understand to be his general plan. If the same course precede the advance of General Wilkinson, and my feeble force should be foiled, the consequences are much to be dreaded. But the Rubicon is now passed, and all that remains is to push for the Capital.

I have the honor to be, sir, yours, &c.

W. HAMPTON.

Extract of a letter from Major General Hampton to the Secretary of War, dated CHAZEY, November 15, 1813.

"I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter I received the last evening from General Wilkinson, by Colonel Atkinson, whom I had sent to him for the purpose of settling the plan of our proposed joint operations. Of the consistency of this letter with that of the 6th instant, and my answer, or of the insinuation it contains, I shall say nothing. Upon so plain a case, and an attempt so unworthy the occasion, common sense will afford every explanation I could wish. I shall make the necessary arrangements for placing the troops in Winter quarters, and commence my journey to the Southward."

Failure of the Northern Army.

HEADQ'RS, NEAR CORNWALL, U. C.

November 12, 1813.

SIR: I this day had the honor to receive your letter of the 8th instant, by Colonel Atkinson, and want language to express my sorrow for your determination not to join the division under your command with the troops under my immediate orders.

As such resolution defeats the grand objects of the campaign in this quarter, which, before the receipt of your letter, were thought to be completely within our power, no suspicion being entertained that you would decline the junction directed, it will oblige us to take post at the French Mills, on Salmon river, or in their vicinity, for the Winter.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, &c.

J. WILKINSON.

Major Gen. HAMPTON.

Correspondence between the Secretary of War and Major General Wilkinson.

[Submitted to the President by the Secretary of War, on the 23d of July, and communicated to General Wilkinson on the 5th of August, 1813.]

The time at which we have reason to expect an ascendancy on Lake Ontario. If our hopes on that head be fulfilled, though but for a short period, we must avail ourselves of the circumstance, to give to the campaign a new and increased activity.

For this purpose our forces on the Ontario should be concentrated, because neither section of them, as they are now divided, is competent to any great object.

The point of concentration is more doubtful:

1. If at Fort George, our utmost success can but give us the command of the peninsula, which, if General Harrison succeeds against Malden, will be of diminished interest, both to us and to the enemy: to us, because Malden will more completely cover our Western frontier, and control the savages, than Forts George and Erie: to the enemy, because, Malden lost, our inroad upon the peninsula will but have the effect of shortening, not of dividing, the enemy's line of operations; in a word, success at this point will not give to the campaign a character of decisive advantage.

2. If, on the other hand, we make Sackett's Harbor the point of concentration, Kingston may become the object of our attack, which, by the way, will but be returning to the original plan of campaign prescribed to General Dearborn. This place is of much importance to the enemy, and will no doubt be defended by him with great obstinacy, and with all the resources which can be safely drawn from other points. That it may be taken by a joint application of our naval and military means is not, however, to be questioned. The enclosed diagram will show the number and character of the enemy's defences. His batteries on No. 1 cannot be sustained but by his fleet. These carried, he is open to a descent at Nos. 2 and 3. If he divides his force between both, we oppose one half of his strength with the whole of ours. If he concentrates at No. 2, we seize No. 3, and command both the town and the shipping. If he concentrates at No. 3, we occupy No. 2, and with nearly the same results.

Contemporary with this movement, another may be made on the side of Lake Champlain, indicating an intention of attacking Montreal and its dependencies, and really attacking them, if, to save Kingston, these posts have been materially weakened.

3. Another and different operation, to which our means are competent, would be a movement from Sackett's Harbor to Madrid, on the St. Lawrence. At this place the river may be most easily crossed. The ground opposite to it is a narrow bluff, skirted by the river on one side, and a swamp of great extent and of difficult passage on the other. This gained and fortified, our fleet continuing to command the water line from the head of the river to Ogdensburgh, and Lake St. Francis occupied with a few gunboats and barges, the army may march against Montreal, in concert with General Hampton. The only natural difficulty to the execution of this plan would be presented by a branch of the Grand river, which must be crossed; but at this season, though deep, it is believed to be fordable.

Under the preceding supposition it is respectfully submitted, whether it will not be most advisable to make Sackett's Harbor the point of concentration, and leave to the commanding General an election (to be determined by circumstances) between the two plans suggested under the second and third heads.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Approved and adopted, July 23, 1813.

WASHINGTON, August 6, 1813.

I have examined the projects of the campaign, intended for the past and ensuing stages of it, on the side of Canada, which you put into my hands yesterday. The novelty of the subject to me, and the pressure of time, will prevent the deliberate consideration of it which its importance merits; and therefore I shall confine myself to a few brief observations touching the project of the 23d ult.

1. If we command Lake Ontario (without which the project is impracticable) and our force be competent to carry Kingston, the incorporation of our troops should take place at Sackett's Harbor, and the attack be made as promptly as possible.

2. On the contrary, should our combined disposable force be deemed incompetent to the certain and speedy reduction of Kingston, then it may be preferable to strengthen our force at Fort George, cut up the British force in that quarter, destroy the Indian establishments, and (should General Harrison fail in his objects) march a detachment to capture Malden.

While these operations are pending, a bold faint or provisional attack on Montreal, by Major General Hampton, will certainly call Sir George Prevost to that place; and it is presumable that, seeing our movements directed towards Erie, he may carry his best troops with him from Kingston.

Failure of the Northern Army.

These suggestions spring from my desire to hazard as little as possible in the outset, and to secure, infallibly, whatever may be attempted, with the intention to increase our own confidence, to diminish that of the enemy, and to popularise the war.

After our operations on the peninsula have been closed, we may raze the works there under your provision, leave our settlements on the strait in tranquillity, and like lightning must direct our whole force against Kingston; and having reduced that place, and captured the shipping, we may descend the stream, and form a junction with the column of General Hampton in the neighborhood of Montreal, should the lateness of the season permit, by which all our movements, after the conquest of Upper Canada, must be governed.

To give General Hampton's movements a menacing aspect, and to enable him to profit by events, he should take with him a heavy train of battering cannon and mortar pieces, which will be found indispensable in the attack of Montreal; and to weaken that place, and to favor a protracted season, I would advise that a heavy column of militia or volunteers, if engaged for three months only, should be put in motion from the vicinity of Lake Memphramagog, to descend the river St Francis, and take post on the right bank of Lake St. Petre, with a battering train of travelling carriages, organized and equipped either to keep post or retire when the season, or other circumstances, should render expedient.

Before I close this letter, I will beg leave to call your attention to several specific points, on which I require information and authority, which I deem essential to the salutary discharge of the high and solemn trust about to devolve upon me.

1. A copy of the instructions to Major General Hampton, for my government in the correspondence to ensue between us.

2. Shall I be allowed a private secretary, which is necessary, and of right belongs to the command on which I am about to enter?

3. I require permission to take for my Aids-de-Camp such officers as are best fitted to discharge the important duties of the station.

4. I ask authority (or it is understood that I possess it) to supply every defect of the munitions of war and transport, by land or water, by means of the authorized agents.

5. I entreat that ample funds may be deposited in proper hands, to give effect to the department of intelligence, without which the chief will find himself almost hoodwinked.

6. I trust no order, of whatever nature, will be passed to any officer under my command, but through my hands. This is not only necessary to the regular conduct of the public service, but it is vitally essential to the preservation of sound subordination, and is conformable to the rules of the service in all armies, inasmuch as he who is responsible for all should have the control of all.

7. I hope I may be expressly authorized to detach from my command all persons who may manifest a temper or disposition to excite discontents, to generate factions, or embitter the service. This is indispensable to put down seditious spirits, and to harmonize the corps.

8. Should we move against Kingston in the first instance, the withdrawal of our force from Fort George will enable the enemy to reoccupy that point, and, for a brief period, to harass our frontier on that strait. May not the militia, or a body of volunteers, be called forth to relieve the regular troops at that place, and prevent discontents and complaints?

9. For the maintenance of the necessary authority of the chief, it is hoped that the Secretary of War will decline and forbid all correspondence with his subordinate officers, except in cases of personal grievance.

10. I beg to be advised of the means of communication between our military positions, and particularly from Sackett's Harbor to Burlington, which should be rapid and infallible.

11. I ask authority to equip the whole of our horse artillery, and to mount the whole of our dragoons, because these arms will be found all important in every combat which may ensue.

A serious impression of the dread responsibility which awaits me, and a correct sense of the public expectation which accompanies me, must be my apology for giving you so much trouble.

With respect, I have the honor, &c.

J. A. WILKINSON.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 8, 1813.

SIR: I have given to your observations of the sixth instant all the consideration they so justly merit.

The main objection to any plan which shall carry our operations wide of Kingston and westward of it, is, that, in the event of its success, it leaves the strength of the enemy unbroken; it but wounds the tail of the lion, and of course is not calculated to hasten the termination of the war, either by increasing our own vigor, or by diminishing that of the enemy. Kingston is the great depot of his resources; and so long as he retains this, and keeps open his communication with the sea, he will not want the means of multiplying his naval and other defences, and of reinforcing or renewing the war in the West. Kingston, therefore, as well on grounds of policy as of military principle, presents the first and great object of the campaign.

There are two ways of approaching this; by direct or by indirect attack: by breaking down the enemy's battalions and forcing his works, or by seizing and obstructing the line of his communication, and thus drying up the sources by which he is nourished and maintained. Circumstances must govern in choosing between these different modes. Were our assembled land and naval forces competent to the object, a direct attack would, no doubt, be the shorter and better way; but if, on the contrary, our strength be inferior, or hardly equal to that of the enemy, the indirect attack must be preferred. These considerations have suggested the third plan, to be found in my note of the 23d ultimo. To give execution to this, I would collect my force at the head of the St. Lawrence, make every demonstration of attacking Kingston, proceed rapidly down the river, seize the northern bank at the village of Hamilton, leave a corps to fortify and to hold it, march upon Montreal with the main body, effect there a junction with Hampton, and take a position which shall enable you to secure what you gain. On this plan the navy would perform its part by occupying the mouth of the river, and preventing a pursuit by water; by clearing the river of the armed boats of the enemy; by holding with its own the passage of Hamilton, and by giving support to that position. If the enemy pursues, it must be by land, without subsistence, excepting what he carries on his back, and without artillery. If he remains stationary, his situation must soon become even more serious, as the country in which he is cannot long subsist him. It will then but remain for him to fight his way to Quebec, to perish in the attempt, or to lay down his arms. After this exposition, it is unnecessary to add that, in conducting the present campaign, you will make Kingston your primary object, and that you will choose, as circumstances may warrant, between a direct and indirect attack upon that post.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major Gen. WILKINSON,
Commanding District No. 9.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Aug. 9, 1813.

SIR: In answer to that part of your letter of the 6th instant which calls for information, &c., on certain enumerated points, I have the honor to state:

1. That General Hampton's instructions go only to assemble and organize his division at Burlington. It is intended that he shall operate contemporarily with you, and under your orders, in the prosecution of the plan of campaign which has been given to you.

2. The senior Major General, commanding the principal army, is entitled to the services of a private secretary.

3. The ordnance and other departments of supply, within the district (No. 9) are subject of course to your orders.

4. The Quartermaster General of the Army will supply the funds for secret service.

5. All orders to subordinate officers pass from the War Department to the Adjutant General, to be communicated by him to the General commanding the district in which such subordinate officer may serve.

6. No specific permission is necessary for removing factious or disorderly men. All such will probably become subjects of the confidential reports to be made by Inspectors. To detach such men from one district to another is only shifting the evil; the better way is to report them for dismission.

7. If the corps at Fort George be recalled, the works should be razed, or occupied by a force competent to hold it against an assault. There is a corps of militia and volunteers (to whom the Six Nation Indians have associated themselves) at Black Rock, which may be kept in service. They are commanded by General Porter and Mr. Parrish. [See the confidential letter of General Porter, enclosed.]

8. The Secretary of War will decline and forbid all improper communications, and particularly such as may bear any color of insubordination.

9. Besides the ordinary mode of communication, by mail, expresses may be employed in extraordinary cases.

10. The dragoon and light artillery corps shall be made efficient. Horses may be bought for both. An officer from each corps should be directed to superintend the purchases. Price (average) not to exceed one hundred twenty dollars.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General WILKINSON,
Commanding the Northern Army.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Aug. 21, 1813.

SIR: I arrived here yesterday: my machinery is in motion, and I have strong hopes of giving the change to Sir George, which will lead directly to the object of first importance.

Commodore Chauncey is in port here, and his antagonist, Sir James Yeo, at Kingston. In the late interviews between these naval commanders, the first has zealously sought a combat, which the latter has cautiously avoided; the superiority on the Lake, therefore, remains still to be settled; but I have Chauncey's assurance for it, and place much confidence in his word. It is obviously Sir James's plan to decline a conflict, but on what ground I cannot determine.

Our schooner here will be equipped and manned by Wednesday, and I shall sail with the squadron for Fort George probably the day after; I am endeavoring to draw Sir George after me; but whether I succeed in this attempt or not, should our men and means answer report, and Heaven favor me, I will be in possession of Kingston, or below that place, on the 26th proximo.

Major General Hampton must not budge until everything is matured in this quarter, and we have either got possession of Kingston, or have cut its communication with Montreal, of which I shall give him seasonable advice, via Plattsburg, where I shall calculate on his arrival, the 20th of the ensuing month, completely equipped for a forward movement. If he changes his position, and shows his column west of the lake sooner, it may carry Sir George to Montreal, and produce precautions which might otherwise be neglected until too late for any salutary effect.

Failure of the Northern Army.

The militia called forth by Governor Tompkins, of which, by the by, you gave me no information, should not be arrayed before he hears from me, at Fort George, because the assembly of such a body would increase the alarm, and put all Canada in counter motion, while incidents, beyond the control of man, may intervene to procrastinate my movements, and thus baffle the effects of the proposed co-operation, on the side of Vermont: should a corps of militia be drawn from thence, no movement should be made by them until General Hampton has crossed Champlain.

It would be highly interesting to the public service, and extremely acceptable to me, to see you at Niagara, from whence, should I find it practicable, it is my intention to commence my movement down the lake, about the 15th of the next month; the best possible disposition for the safety of that frontier, and for the security of the vast mass of ordnance and stores, which I must leave there, may render your advice and authority indispensably necessary, to avert clamors, and prevent any obstruction to my prompt movement.

With high consideration and respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JA. WILKINSON.

Hon. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, August 26, 1813.

SIR: Chauncey will go out, he says, to-morrow or next day, to seek Sir James. I see the necessity of settling the point of naval superiority before we commit ourselves, and, therefore, the decision cannot be had too soon. In the meantime the essential arrangements progress, and if the means can be mustered, they will insure the end.

I fear Yeo will avoid a contest, to spin out the campaign, and gain time for reinforcements, and the organization of militia; but if he will not come out, we must blockade him. I go for Niagara the moment our arrangements are matured here. Sir George has actually gone for the head of the lake with a reinforcement. To prevent his playing tricks with Boyd, I have sent him (Boyd) the note of which you have a copy.

On Saturday, the 21st, one hundred and sixty regular troops ascended by Ogdensburg to Kingston, and on the 23d and 24th, they were followed by five hundred Highlanders in their kilts; who conducted up one hundred boats: thus we see that this quarter attracts chief attention. All my efforts will be made to induce Sir George to draw after him a chief part of the garrison of Kingston, which must now be near five thousand strong. The situation of Proctor and the irruption of our Indians have gone far to excite these dispositions. Meet me at Niagara, if possible, and for God's sake press on the recruits from Albany and the southward, and send me Wadsworth, Swift, Fenwick, and Izard. All thing go well here, and, thank God, the men are recovering rapidly. I hear not a word from Hampton. I hope he does not mean to take the stud; but if so, we can do without him, and he should be sent home.

Truly yours, JA. WILKINSON.
Gen. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Aug. 30, 1813.

SIR: With every exertion he could make, it was not until the last evening Chauncey got under way, and the weather being calm, he must be now off this harbor.

Agreeably to my information, Sir James Yeo sailed for the head of the lake, the 22d instant, with two captured schooners in addition to his squadron, no doubt to co-operate with Sir George, but did not get clear of the Ducks before the 25th.

Brigadier General Boyd is warned of this movement, and, being placed on his guard, he ought to baffle every enterprise of the enemy. What an awful crisis have I reached! If Sir George beats Boyd, and Sir James, Chauncey, my prospects are blasted; and the campaign will, I fear, be lost. If Sir George beats Boyd, and Chauncey beats Sir James, Kingston yet may be ours; but should both the Knights be beaten, and our Quartermaster can find transports in season, (of which I have fears, as I found next to none here,) then we shall certainly winter in Montreal, if not discomfited by some act of God. If I could have mustered three thousand combatants on this ground, with transports to bear them, I would now have been before Kingston, where Sir George has left only one thousand five hundred regular troops, and about five hundred militia; but our utmost force is short of two thousand five hundred, as you will perceive from the enclosed return; and we could not have found boats to transport one thousand.

The enemy having determined to change his system of operations, from defence to offence, is assembling his whole disposable force at the head of the lake, to attack Fort George; thus placing himself at too great a distance from Montreal to give seasonable succor to that city: he certainly presumes on our imbecility, and we as certainly should take advantage of his presumption.

The militia called for should, therefore, be immediately arrayed, and marched to this frontier, and Major General Hampton should, without delay, cross the Champlain, and commence his movement towards St. Johns, taking the Isle aux Noix in his route, or not, as circumstances may justify.

Four thousand of the best appointed yeomanry should be ordered to rendezvous at Hamilton, on the St. Lawrence, for eventual operations with this division; and the residue may accompany or follow Hampton, to draw the militia of Montreal, and the disposable force of the lower country, to the east of the St. Lawrence, and thereby make the island an easy conquest from this quarter.

Failure of the Northern Army.

Sir George Prevost, it would seem, has taken his part, and, deluded by the hope of re-conquest, has abandoned his rear to our enterprise, and we might now, without the co-operation of our squadron, safely occupy Madrid, and cut the communication of the two provinces with this division only, if we had transport; but of this we are totally destitute, every boat we command here being at this time absent, with a detachment of eight hundred men, ordered to make a feint to the westward, under pretence of reinforcing Niagara, before I was apprized of Sir George's movements.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Aug. 30, 1813.
5 o'clock, P. M.

SIR: I have commenced, barely, the arrangement of the department of intelligence; an intelligencer left Kingston, or its vicinity, last evening, to tell me that Sir George Prevost had commenced his operations against Boyd, and had driven in his pickets and taken sixty or seventy prisoners, but had been repulsed from his line of encampment. The militia of Montreal are at Kingston, and reinforcements, by single hundreds, are arriving frequently; four hundred men are expected in the course of the week.

The force at Kingston is two thousand men (regulars fifteen hundred, militia five hundred.) Major General Darrach commands, and they are assiduously strengthening their works. Sir James Yeo sailed with six weeks' provisions, expressly to co-operate with Sir George at the head of the lake; a double battle and a double victory offer a strong temptation; but I will not be diverted from my course.

I have written Governor Tompkins on the subject of a draught of militia, for the strait of Niagara, to supply the absence of our troops of the line, and prevent clamor, but have not been so happy as to receive an acknowledgment of my letter.

With perfect respect, your obedient servant.

J. A. WILKINSON.

Hon. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, SACKETT'S HARBOR,
September 6, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: I arrived here yesterday. Nothing new, except that Prevost has returned to Kingston. General Hampton will go through the campaign cordially and vigorously, but will resign at the end of it. He will be ready to move by the 20th, with an effective regular force of four thousand, and a militia detachment of one thousand five hundred. On the supposition that Sir George had decidedly taken his part, and had chosen the peninsula as his champ de bataille, I had ordered Hampton to move immediately against the Isle aux Noix. Two thousand militia will be promptly assembled at Champion, twenty-four miles from this place, and on the route to the St. Lawrence. The place was selected as offering two objects, and of course leaving his knightship to guess. To have pushed them directly to Ogdensburg would not have had that advantage. A larger draught would have been difficult. Another view of the subject is, that this part of the plan cannot be confided to militia exclusively; they must be propped by a regular corps, otherwise the back door may not be sufficiently closed and barred.

The battle on the lake! Shall we have one? If Yeo fights and is beaten, all will be well. If he does not fight, the result may also be favorable.

Yours, cordially,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

General WILKINSON.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT GEORGE, September 11, 1813.

"I have indulged the hope, for several days past, that I should have been enabled to address you in propria persona, but in this I have been baffled by a severe and unrelenting malady, which obliges me to resort to the pen of a common friend.

"I reached this place the evening of the fourth. Commodore Chauncey at that time occupied the harbor; and Sir James Yeo, with the British squadron, was vaporizing in front of it. This state of things continued, without any material change, until the evening of the 7th, when a light land breeze gave to the Commodore an opportunity of standing out to meet the enemy. The two squadrons were about two leagues asunder, of consequence an action appeared inevitable: yet so it has happened, that, since that period, until about five o'clock, yesterday, P. M., these two naval armaments have kept from four to eight miles distant, without having exchanged a single shot, or done to each other the smallest visible damage, the British uniformly on the retreat, and the American in pursuit.

"General Peter B. Porter left me to-day, properly authorized and instructed to bring into operation a corps of the Six Nation Indians, which he proposes to increase to one thousand men, by volunteers from the militia, and is disposed to be busy and active wherever he may be directed.

"I hear nothing of Brigadier General McClure and the New York militia. I shall mature my plans for embarkation as rapidly as the difficulties which may oppose me can be removed; but we are greatly deficient in transport, and have not received a single boat from Oswego or any other place. Strong shallops and slip-keels are necessary to the transport of the heavy cannon, ordnance stores, ammunition, clothing, &c.

"I am writing to Bomford for many things, which I was assured I should find here, and I pray you to put him on the alert, or I may be caught in the snow.

"I dictate this under much depression of head and stomach, and am, with great respect and esteem, your most obedient servant.

"JAMES WILKINSON."

Failure of the Northern Army.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT GEORGE, September 16, 1813.

"I have escaped from my pallet, and with a giddy head and trembling hand, will endeavor to scrawl you a few lines, the first I have written since my arrival here.

"With respect to the advance squadrons, we are still without one word of authentic information, but we are entertained by daily rumors, as wild and extravagant as they are inconsistent and contradictory. I hope we may soon have an end of this state of uncertainty, which damps our exertions, and retards our measures.

"The removal of the main body of the troops from this position is an operation of great delicacy and interest; and it was therefore your presence here would have been more important than elsewhere.

"I am not authorized to abandon this useless occupancy, and therefore it must be maintained against the united British force in its vicinity. To secure the end, and nothing must be hazarded, will require a serious drain from our best troops, which enfeebles our too feeble force for the main attack. The head of the militia under McClure has not yet shown itself; when it does, (if in any reasonable time,) and we have conferred, I shall be better enabled to develop the intricate path before me. But, in the mean time, alas! sir, the season will, I fear, be lost.

"The Indians enter into our views with great zeal, and I look for a corps of at least five hundred men in eight days; whether to relieve De Rottenberg of five or six hundred of his effective men, before I turn my back on him, will be determined by considerations of policy in relation to our red allies and the militia, and the fate of our squadron. The enemy profess to-day a total ignorance of the occurrence of an action between the squadrons.

"In the course of sixteen days, the enemy have lost sixty-five men by desertion, we barely six. We count 4,600 on paper, and could show about 3,400 combatants. The enemy, from the best information we have, have about 3,000 men on paper, of whom 1,400 are sick. Shall I make a sweep of them or not, at the hazard of our main object? Not unless that main object is jeopardized by the fate of our squadrons—it would require an operation of three weeks; but my views are forward, and I shall not abandon the prospect while a ray of hope remains.

"I have received your letters, to the 6th, from Sackett's Harbor, and thank you for them. For your comfort, the men here are gaining health, and, with their officers, breathe an ardent spirit for combat."

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT GEORGE, September 18, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: Accident detained the express last evening, and gives me an opportunity to drop you another line.

Not a word more of Chauncey; what has become of him? I pray you to decide whether I am to move with or without any further knowledge of the squadron.

From the enclosed, No. 2, it would appear that the enemy expect tranquil Winter quarters in this neighborhood; for the number of barracks proposed to be built will not receive more than 1,400 or 1,600 men, including guards, ordinary and extraordinary, stow them as you can; but, shall I have the enemy within four miles of this place, making a wide investiture of it from Queens-town to Four Mile creek; or shall I break him up? With our prospects the decision is embarrassing; change them, to the abandonment of the chief design, and our course is direct, viz: to take possession at Burlington Bay, and cut up or capture the whole division in this quarter, which may be estimated at 3,000 regular troops. I pray you to deliberate on these points, and give me your advice without delay.

I have despatched an express to —, for General McClure, of whom I have heard nothing since my last; but to supply the defect of his silence, the enclosed copy of a communication from a committee, of which P. B. Porter is chief, will fully suffice. I have responded in the most courteous terms, making reference to you for your determination on the momentous occasion, as you will perceive from my answer. Now, let me entreat you to weigh these propositions, to take into consideration the possible failure of the militia, and the substitution in such case of these volunteers; for, in the present crisis, we should, if possible, render "assurance doubly sure." The letter of David Rodman (a stranger) is also transmitted for consideration. Let me have your answer, and tell me how to act as speedily as possible; I beseech. The boats from Oswego have not yet arrived.

I am feeble to childhood, but shall look at the troops in battalion on Tuesday.

Truly yours,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Hon. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

FORT GEORGE, September 18, 1813.

SIR: I am ordered by General Wilkinson to forward the enclosed papers: one, a letter from a committee of three, of which P. B. Porter is the first; and the other a letter from Daniel Rodman, the organ of an association of residents in and near Canandaigua.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

H. LEE, JR.,

Major of Infantry, A. D. C.

Hon. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

BLACK ROCK, September 17, 1813.

SIR: In consequence of encouragements from General Boyd, that a general and decisive movement was about to be made by the army, and that an additional force was desirable, we repaired to

Failure of the Northern Army.

Fort George, about five weeks ago, with five hundred men, consisting of volunteers, militia, and Indians. Most of us remained there for twelve or fourteen days, but our hopes not being realized, the men continually dispersed and went home; not, however, without expectations, again encouraged by Generals Boyd and Williams, that we should be shortly called on again to aid in operations which the people in this part of the country, so long harassed by the calamities of war, feel so strong an interest in forwarding. Under similar expectations, many of our friends in the interior have intimated to us their readiness to join with respectable reinforcements on the shortest notice; and we are informed that one company, about seventy strong, is actually on its march, and will arrive here to-day or to-morrow.

We are at this moment much at a loss how to act, and our difficulty is increased by the various rumors and conjectures circulated by the different officers daily arriving from headquarters; some of whom represent that no offensive operations are to be undertaken on this frontier, but that the regular army is immediately to be marched, either to the East to attack Kingston, or to the West to join General Harrison. Others state, that an attack is to be made on the British forces in the vicinity of this place.

Under these circumstances, we are induced to inquire of you, whether such a force as we have it in our power to raise is desired by you to effectuate your plans; and, if so, in what numbers, and at what time? If your object be to sally out upon the enemy at Fort George, we could bring you a respectable force. But, on the contrary, if you meditate an attack at some other point, and the withdrawal of the regular troops from Fort George, and placing this frontier on the defensive only, by means of militia, we would observe that our prepared force is of such a character as could not be engaged in this service.

Upon the supposition that you intend to withdraw the regular troops from this frontier, we beg leave to submit a proposition for your consideration.

We believe we are not incorrect in saying that it would require nearly quite as great a force to defend this line of frontier against a given force of the enemy, as it would to attack and subdue that enemy. Sir George Prevost has ordered the militia of the upper province to be called out en masse. They are to assemble on Saturday next. And if, after your departure, the enemy opposite here should take it in his head to retain all his regular force, and play off his skill against the inexperience of our militia, we might have occasion to fear a repetition of former scenes in the present war.

Our proposition (in case of your leaving this place) is, that we be permitted to raise, between this and the first of October, a volunteer force of from 1,000 to 1,200 men, exclusive of Indians. That we add to it as many of the militia stationed on the lines as may be willing to join us. That we be furnished with a small train (say four pieces) of artillery, with experienced officers, and men to fight them; and that with this force we be authorized to invade the enemy's country.

Should you think proper to confer such an authority on us, and direct that the volunteers shall be furnished with arms, ammunition, provisions, &c., and receive pay while in actual service, we pledge our lives that, before the close of the season, we will occupy the whole of the valuable and populous peninsula, opposite this river, and either capture, destroy, or disperse, all the enemy's force in this quarter.

You may, perhaps, make it convenient to send an answer by the bearer, Captain Hall.

We are, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servants,

PETER B. PORTER,
CYRENIUS CHAPIN,
JOSEPH McCLURE.

Maj. Gen. WILKINSON.

CANANDAIGUA, September 14, 1813.

SIR: A large number of patriotic citizens of this and the adjacent towns, anxious to do their duty in a crisis so interesting to the nation in general, and to this part of the country in particular, have associated themselves to volunteer their services to the United States for the residue of the campaign at least.

In order to effectuate their intentions, however, it will be necessary that their movements should receive your approbation and sanction, and that they should be assured that the corps, whether a company, battalion, or (as is possible) a regiment, should be received, organized, and countenanced by your order and authority. The lateness of the season, and the anxiety of the members, induce us to request an early and authoritative reply, that the association may be equipped according to law, and be useful to their country this season. It may not be hardly decorous for us to say it, but we must observe that the subscribers will prove to be obedient and brave soldiers.

In their behalf, I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

DANIEL RODMAN.

Maj. Gen. WILKINSON,
or officer commanding Fort George.

FORT GEORGE, September 18, 1813.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of yesterday, which reached me last evening, gives you a claim to my acknowledgments, and to those of your country. But, as I am altogether unauthorized, by law or instruction, to sanction your plan for the levy of a body of volunteers, and as your anticipations, propositions, and suggestions embrace a range and a character upon which I have neither right nor authority to deliberate, I have considered it my duty to transmit a copy of your letter to the Secretary of War, now at Sackett's Harbor, by express, for his deliberation and decision.

I hope he may find it convenient and proper to meet your views, and have only to add, that you shall be advised of his answer, without a moment's delay, after it may reach my hands.

Failure of the Northern Army.

With high consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

TO PETER B. PORTER,
Major CYRENUS CHAPIN, and JOSEPH McCLORE.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Sept. 18, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: Our information from the other side of the lake amounts to this: Prevost goes to Montreal; the whole regular force in Kingston consists of ten companies of De Waterville's regiment; that at Prescott, of two companies of the same corps and about forty artillerists.

De Waterville's regiment was made up in Spain, is composed of Poles, Germans, Spaniards, and Portuguese, and completely disaffected. What a precious moment, my friend, is this!

The Commodore was brought back to us yesterday by adverse winds. He goes this morning; let not the great objects of the campaign be hazarded by running after Yeo; these accomplished, his race is run. Kingston, or the point below, seized, all above perishes, because the tree is then girdled.

In speaking of your artillery, you do not include the guns taken at Fort George, and which will be necessary for its defence. A small garrison will be sufficient against assault; siege we need not dread. It is already too late to live in trenches. Porter (of the artillery) would do well to command the place. Tell him from me he is a Brigadier by brevet.

The means of transportation are now with you; hasten your march, and may God bless you in all your enterprises.

Yours, truly and always,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

General WILKINSON.

Extracts of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

SEPTEMBER 20, 1813.

"I am well again, and that's a good thing; for I have been, during my sickness, somewhat of a Smelfungus.

"Now, indeed, would be a fine time to slip into the St. Lawrence, if Chauncey could keep Sir James blockaded above Kingston, and command the river below at the same time, and our preparations were completely matured; but it is an herculean task to extract order from chaos. No time has, or shall be, lost on my part; but we cannot, when prepared at all points, control the winds. It was last night, only, the transports from Oswego arrived; and, if I am not hardly opposed by weather, I hope I shall have one thousand men afloat by the 26th, and complete my embarkation on the 30th; after which, until we reach Grenadier Island, I must look to our squadron and the heavens for safety.

"Chauncey tells me he is liable to be blown off from his station, and, in such case, Sir James may slip out by him, but promises to follow him.

It is material, to prevent the enemy from following and cutting our rear, that some competent force should take post on the St. Lawrence, below Kingston; and I pray of you to make this arrangement with Chauncey. Before I left Sackett's Harbor, I ordered a dozen slip-keeled boats, to carry fifty men each, and to row thirty oars, to be armed with a light cannon in their bow. This armament is to sweep the St. Lawrence of the enemy's gunboats, and to take post in advance, when and wherever it may be advisable. I beg you, if necessary on your part, to give effect to this order.

"We have just received advice confirmatory of a naval combat on Lake Erie, in which it is said Perry has taken the whole British squadron, on the 10th instant, and brought the vessels into 'Putney harbor, at the islands,' his own vessel, the Lawrence, barely capable of being floated. The action lasted six hours. This will cancel your news from our Commodore. The enclosed letter from General McClure breathes a good spirit, but he will not be up for several days. In the meantime I shall prepare his orders, to be ready to give him the command.

"A body of horse, a small one, at that point where the fate of the island is to be decided by combat (for I believe not that we shall get possession of Montreal without a battle) will be invaluable. Burn has been ordered hence, sometime before my arrival, to recruit his cavalry, and prepare them for action, and I shall order him by express to-morrow to incline by indirect dilatory marches towards Hamilton, there to look for further orders, somewhere about Antwerp, or that quarter. From Denmark or Champion he is to advise the commanding officer at Sackett's Harbor of his movements.

"De Rottenberg is under the full belief that I mean to attack him, and I shall keep up the delusion as long as possible.

"The snail's pace of the reinforcements approaching this division, and, pardon me, their direction and route, occasion me surprise. Of what avail will be the detachments under Colonels Randolph and Coles,* which are, I learn, from Washington, on their march to this place, where they cannot, or will not, arrive before the 15th proximo? If these detachments had been ordered on by all the available water communications from Annapolis to Albany, they could have reached Sackett's Harbor in season, and a column of eight hundred men would have been found an important desideratum in our impending operations. Where, also, are the one thousand men reported to me by Colonel Duane as being ready for march, before I reached Philadelphia? I must hope, near Sackett's Harbor. I put these questions to you that I may apprise you of facts, that you, with whom it rests, may apply the remedy, for I find we possess little military subordination or respect, and that a chief of an army is obeyed more from courtesy than principle or professional obligations.

* These corps arrived in time.

Failure of the Northern Army.

"I send this by the privateer Fox to Commodore Chauncey, with a request that he accelerate its progress to you. This place neither stops a gap, extends our possessions, nor covers or protects a country; it is good for naught, but to command the ground it occupies, and, therefore, I shall dismantle and abandon it."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Wilkinson, dated

"SACKETT'S HARBOR, Sept. 22, 1813.

"DEAR GENERAL: Your letters of the 16th, 17th, and 18th instants, have been this moment received; I hasten to answer them. The main object must be prosecuted. Chauncey is not broken down; he can and will command the lake, and, while he does so, our position at Fort George may be maintained. If the enemy's sick list amounts to one thousand four hundred out of three thousand, the enemy can undertake nothing with effect. In this view of the subject, close with P. B. Porter's proposition, made in the following words, viz: 'Our proposition (in case of your leaving this place) is, that we be permitted to raise, between this and the 1st of October, a volunteer force of from one thousand to one thousand two hundred men, exclusive of Indians; that we add to it as many of the militia stationed on the lines as may be willing to join us; that we be furnished with a small train, (say four pieces of field artillery, with experienced officers and men to fight them,) and that with this force we be authorized to invade the enemy's country.'

"Rodman's corps may join Porter. Any volunteers you may have with the army, whose times are near expiring, and who are desirous of continuing in service, may do so, also. We will cover the whole by a requisition upon Governor Tompkins for additional militia.

"The enemy's fleet have left the Chesapeake, I believe, for Halifax, whence the land troops are to be sent into Canada—another motive for quick movements.

"My last letters by Chauncey, of the 18th or 19th, gave you all we yet know. Prevost has left Kingston, it is said for Quebec, more probably for Montreal.

"Yours, faithfully and ever,
"JOHN ARMSTRONG."

NIAGARA, Sept. 27, 1813, 6 o'clock, A. M.

DEAR SIR: I received, at eight o'clock last evening, your interesting letter of the 22d, and shall employ its authorizations to the best possible effect.

Fifteen hundred men were embarked, with orders to sail the day before yesterday, but a strong easterly wind has made it impossible to move.

The whole force (say three thousand combatants, after deducting the garrisons of Forts George and Niagara) were ready for embarkation yesterday, and, as the weather is serene at this moment, I hope the whole may be able to move at dusk this day; I say, at dusk, because I am desirous to keep my neighbors under a delusion as long as possible; they are perplexed as to my intentions, and will not be able to penetrate them before they have discovered the course of my flotilla.

I have authentic information from York the evening of the 24th instant. The brigade of militia in the vicinity were required to assemble the 25th, and six hundred men of the 41st and 49th regiments, second battalion, were daily expected there on their route to this neighborhood. This is good; and still better, three spacious block houses are ordered by Sir George to be erected at York.

But, sir, here is one drawback: the tantalizing Sir James Yeo was in shore with his fleet, on the evening of the 24th, (Friday,) about twenty-eight miles east of York. Where he is now we know not, for he has not since been heard of, and Chauncey is just sending out the Lady of the Lake and the Neptune to reconnoitre York, and the coast in that quarter. What may be the views of the Knight? To gasconade, to retard my movement, or to enable De Rottenberg to follow me, I am unable to divine; but will not be longer delayed, and, therefore, shall be twenty miles to the eastward before to-morrow morning, should the weather permit. If Sir James can be discovered, Chauncey will seek him; otherwise, he will sail with me to cover my left flank.

As we have not a moment to lose, I shall proceed directly to Grenadier* island, writing you, and sending orders to the commanding officer, by a despatch boat, en passant.

After all, we are so straitened for transport that we shall not find room for more than fifteen days' provisions; indeed, we have little more to spare from this position, and, therefore, our sole dependence must be on the magazines at Sackett's Harbor, which the contractor should be personally advised. Heaven protect you!

Truly yours,

JAMES WILKINSON.

HON. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

FORT GEORGE, Oct. 2, 1813.

DEAR SIR: Since my last, of the 17th instant, I have had difficulties, perplexities, and anxieties, sufficient to discompose a saint.

Commodore Chauncey having ascertained that the British squadron was on the opposite coast, agreeably to the information I had given him, left port on the evening of the 27th to look for it; on the morning of the 28th we discovered our squadron off this place about mid-channel, and standing for the York shore; about 12 o'clock, though very distant, we discovered it was warmly engaged—the enemy to leeward, and scarcely discernible; we could, with our glasses, distinguish the Pike firing both her batteries, and frequently enveloped in smoke. The enemy were forced towards the head of the lake, and about 3 o'clock we lost sight of our sternmost vessel, the action still continuing. From that period, until yesterday morning, I was kept in suspense as to the issue of the action; the wind blowing a gale from the southeast, and producing such a swell as made it impossible for our privateers to keep the lake; and of course my flotilla was confined to port with the troops, either on board, or encamped on the beach. The evening before the last, our whole fleet (alone) were discovered beating down the lake. In the course of the night they came to, off Four Mile creek, and yesterday morning the Commodore presented himself. Our observations on the action were in the main correct, except that the battle was fought by the Pike alone, (or next to it,) who, having carried away Sir James's mizzen and main topmasts, his squadron bore up to protect him, and Chauncey was engaged with the whole. Unlucky fellow! he could have taken a schooner and a brig, but his eyes being fixed on the Commodore, he would not look at smaller game. Finally, Sir James, as usual, ran away; was chased to the head of the lake; came to anchor close in shore; and the gale and tremendous sea threatening, in case of a continued action, to put both squadrons on shore—Sir James, with the British force, assembled there, and Chauncey into the hands of the enemy—he clawed off and came down to confer with me. He has my opinions in writing, and I expect his answer this morning.

Early yesterday, before I had heard from the Commodore, the wind, for the first time, becoming favorable, I despatched all my batteaux; and, as soon as I had ascertained Sir James Yeo's situation, our sail boats followed; but, alas! before one o'clock the wind again came round to the southeast, and several of our schooners returned, though a majority of them, and the whole of the batteaux, proceeded, and I hope reached Eighteen Mile creek.

I have been detained by the arrival of about three hundred and fifty Indians, to whom I was obliged to give an audience and a talk, and I lodged in this place to see whether the enemy might look at it, and what would be the conduct of the garrison of six hundred and ninety militia, and eight hundred regular troops, under the command of Colonel Scott. We have just had an alarm, and being myself among the first on parade, I have witnessed a scene by which I shall profit Scott, before I leave him, which will be in a couple of hours, as, thank Almighty God, the wind again breezes, though it has rained all night, and still continues to rain. Oh! if it may please God to favor us with this breeze, we shall soon be near you; but it is in his power, by adverse winds, to delay, and, by tempests, to destroy us. I move with about three thousand five hundred men. Farewell, and God preserve you!

JAMES WILKINSON.

Hon. JOHN ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of War.

13th Con. 2d Sess.—77

Extract from the Journal of the Secretary of War.

"4th of October, 1813.—General Wilkinson arrived at Sackett's Harbor on this day from Fort George. He immediately visited the Secretary of War, in company with Generals Lewis and Brown, and in the presence of these officers remonstrated freely and warmly against making an attack on Kingston, urging the propriety of passing that post and of going directly to Montreal.

"The Secretary of War differed from General Wilkinson in opinion, but thought his objections worthy of consideration, and proposed a meeting on the day following for that purpose.

"The meeting took place accordingly, when General Wilkinson presented the paper marked No. 1. That marked No. 2 was presented by the Secretary, and the opinion with which it closes was adopted as that which should regulate the movements of the army."

No. 1.

Reasons for attacking Kingston anterior to a descent upon Montreal.

1st. We shall capture a garrison of eight hundred or one thousand, and demolish a strong hold of the enemy.

2d. We shall destroy his naval depot and magazines of every species.

3d. We shall, by this operation, diminish his force, destroy his resources, and place the division at the head of the lake, under De Rottenberg, in great difficulty and distress; and

4th. We shall destroy every naval resource, and of consequence prevent the building, equipping, and even repairing, a single vessel.

Against this attack it may be urged—

1st. That the reduction of the place may cost more than we calculate on.

2d. It may encumber us with wounded and sick; and

3d. It is possible the British squadron may, as heretofore, elude Commodore Chauncey, and find us before Kingston, or overtake us on the St. Lawrence.

In the first place, from the lateness of the season, the loss of a few days may expose us to the autumnal rains, and jeopard the chief object of the campaign. In the second place, our own force will be diminished and our movements retarded; and in the third place, the chief object of the campaign, the capture of Montreal, will be utterly defeated, and our own army subjected to great difficulties, losses, and perils.

Submitted to the honorable Secretary of War.

JAMES WILKINSON.

No. 2.

1st. The Niagara division will probably arrive here in a day or two.

2d. The weather is yet good, and the lake navigable by scows and boats.

3d. The enemy's main force is in the neighborhood of Fort George, and his fleet at the head of the lake.

4th. The garrison of Kingston does not exceed eight hundred or one thousand men.

Failure of the Northern Army.

5th. If we effect a landing at McPherson's farm, on the eastern side of Kingston, a point may be seized which will command the town, the forts, and the harbor; and, within seven hours after the landing is effected, a sufficient battery may be erected and in operation.

6th. Nine and twelve pounders will be sufficient for burning block-houses, &c., and may be dragged by the men.

7th. The time necessary to reduce the place will not exceed a single day, and of course will not materially interfere, on that account, with our object below.

8th. The loss we may sustain can only be conjectured. Judging from that at Fort George, where the enemy were more numerous, it will be considerable.

9th. The advantages of taking Kingston are two: you sever the enemy's line of communication, and you expel him from his only secure harbor.

The premises assumed under the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th heads, may change, and our conclusions with them. The only safe decision therefore is, that if the British fleet shall not escape Commodore Chauncey, and get into Kingston harbor; if the garrison of that place be not largely reinforced; and if the weather be such as will allow us to navigate the lake securely, Kingston shall be our first object, otherwise we shall go directly to Montreal.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, Oct. 5, 1813.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 9, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: Does there exist between you and the Commodore a clear and distinct understanding on the subject of our plan of operations, and the kind and degree of assistance he will be able to give to its execution? Can he take a position which shall have the effect of shutting in Yeo, and of covering our descent upon Kingston, and our subsequent movement down the St. Lawrence? Is it not probable that a part of the enemy's fleet will, immediately on our appearance at Grenadier Island, occupy the passage of the river? If we can be covered in going to our first object, and should attain that, we may be able to dispense with further naval assistance; but, should we fail, (a contingency which, being possible, ought to be regarded,) naval aid will be necessary to the prosecution of the second part of the plan. As the fleet is wind-bound, and the Commodore here, explanations on these points may be readily and conveniently given. Let me know the result, and believe me

Truly yours,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major Gen. WILKINSON.

HEADQUARTERS, SACKETT'S HARBOR,

October 9, 1813.

DEAR SIR: The Commodore and myself have hitherto understood each other perfectly, and I think we shall harmonize to the end. He is ready to sail the moment the wind serves; and you may rest assured that nothing essential to give effect to the operations of the army under my command, and to accomplish the views of the Government, has been or shall be omitted.

Respectfully and truly yours,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Hon. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, SACKETT'S HARBOR,

October 18, 1813.

"The diminution of our force, by disease and various casualties, and more especially the uncertainty of the period of our movement against Montreal, render it necessary, in my judgment, that you should revoke the order of march you have given to Major General Hampton, and that he should be directed to march for Morrisville, as rapidly as may be consistent with the health of his troops. This proposition is founded on the presumption that we make the reduction of Kingston and the conquests of the upper provinces the first objects of our operations."

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 19, 1813.

SIR: I received your letter of yesterday, and should have answered it more promptly, but that business of the South and West required my immediate attention.

When, on the 4th instant, you returned from Fort George, we had the prospect of a speedy concentration of our forces at this point. The Niagara division had sailed on the 30th ultimo; the enemy's principal force occupied a cantonment between Lakes Erie and Ontario; his fleet was at the head of the lake, and his garrison at Kingston reduced to seven or eight hundred men. Under these circumstances it was no doubt wise to decide as we did, that our first attack should be carried against that place; but do these circumstances any longer exist? The expected concentration is but now effected, (18th of October.) A reinforcement of one thousand five hundred men has been thrown into Kingston; the British fleet has got into port there, and our force, from disease and other casualties, is, according to your statement, diminished and diminishing. To reinstate and augment this, it is now proposed to order General Hampton from his present position at Chatauge, to Morrisville, on the St. Lawrence. These places are distant upwards of one hundred miles. A march of such length, at this season of the year, and in the present condition of the roads, loaded as he is with a train of artillery, with means of subsistence, and with tents and baggage, cannot be performed under fifteen days, to which must be added the time necessary for giving the order for making the arrangements preliminary to such a movement, and for making also the subsequent one from Morrisville to the mouth of the Gaunanoqui river; all of which would probably protract the moment of junction till the 15th of November.

Failure of the Northern Army.

Admonished, as we are, by the storms which have assailed us for ten days past, and which have not yet ceased, I cannot but think that a period so late would of itself be fatal to the project.

Other circumstances lead to the same conclusion. Beginning our operations from the mouth of the Gaunanoqui river, we shall have a march of twenty-four miles to Kingston, and through a country covered with woods, destitute of inhabitants, and pervious only by two roads, which, without any interruption from the enemy, are represented as nearly impassable at present. This movement (unlike that originally projected*) cannot be made without the aid of horses, and a less number of these than six hundred,† including the second regiment of dragoons, is, I understand, deemed insufficient. Now these must be fed, and their provender drawn from this place, as the country between Gravelly Point and Putneyville affords none, and interposes a swampy desert, which shuts us out from the supplies of Rossie and Rayville, &c. An important question arises here—can the necessary forage be obtained from this neighborhood? The Quartermaster General says "it cannot, that it must be carted from Lowville, (forty miles distant,) and transported hence by water." These facts, on your plan, menace our operations against Kingston, with a delay which would probably surround us with all the embarrassments of a Canadian Winter, and extinguish every hope of grasping the other—the safer and the greater object below. I call it the safer and greater object, because, at Montreal, you find the weaker place, and the smaller force to encounter: at Montreal, you meet a fresh, unexhausted, efficient reinforcement of four thousand men: at Montreal, you approach your own resources, and establish between you and them an easy and an expeditious intercourse: at Montreal, you occupy a point which must be gained in carrying your attacks home to the purposes of the war, and which, if seized now, will save one campaign: at Montreal, you hold a position which completely severs the enemy's line of operations; which shuts up the Ottawa as well as the St. Lawrence against him; and which, while it restrains all below, withers and perishes all above itself.

These, General, are the thoughts which present themselves on your proposition, and which I understand as abandoning, for this campaign, the proposed attack on Montreal. I am entirely disposed to listen to all that can be said on the other side of the question, but, at present, the reasons assigned leave me no doubt of the policy of pursuing, promptly and firmly,‡ the plan already indicated, and which, besides the approbation of the

HEADQUARTERS, SACKETT'S HARBOR,
October 19, 1813.

DEAR SIR: I was about to embark for Grenadier Island when I received your letter of this morning, which I will endeavor to answer; my very feeble condition, and the want of time for reflection, disqualify me from doing full justice to my opinions.

You will recollect that, in my letter of the 6th of August, I proposed to take Kingston, as preliminary to an attack on Montreal; you offered a different opinion in your letter of the 8th, and, on my arrival here, I submitted the alternative to a council of war, which decided in favor of your plan to leave Kingston untouched, and proceed directly against Montreal; but ulterior considerations and information† have induced me to adhere to my original plan.

Permit me, previous to the discussion of the grounds of my opinion, to submit a few incidental remarks.

It is extremely doubtful what may be the present force of the enemy at Kingston, and very uncertain how much our own force may have been diminished by disease, and the casualties attending our movements.

From the retreat of Proctor before General Harrison, and the information received from Colonel Scott, I think it probable that De Rottenberg, with the effectives of his division, has gone to reinforce Proctor, and that the troops which have descended to Kingston consisted only of the sick of that division.

* This council consisted of Generals Wilkinson, Lewis, Brown, and Swartwout, and Commodore Chauncey. The opinion was unanimous.

NOTE.—Before the Secretary of War left Sackett's Harbor, and while it was deemed practicable, and was intended to carry our attacks against both Kingston and Montreal, he had one or more conversations with Commodore Chauncey, on the general subject of naval co-operation. These had particular reference to two points—the place of landing, [in case Kingston was the object of attack,] and the degree of protection which the fleet could be able to render to the debarkation of the army. The places of descent indicated by the Secretary were three:

1st. McPherson's farm, two miles and a half below Kingston.

2d. The mouth of the Little Cataraqui, four or five miles above Kingston; and

3d. The mouth of the Gaunanoqui river, twenty-four miles below Kingston.

The Commodore's answer was substantially as follows: that he would not take upon himself the responsibility of covering the landing of the army at the first of these points, but that he would cover its landing at either of the other two.

† This ulterior arrangement was not communicated to the Secretary of War.

Failure of the Northern Army.

My idea of recalling General Hampton to reinforce us, was produced by an alarm with respect to the insufficiency of our force, which I found spreading; and the direction which I suggested was founded on your own proposition* of the 13th instant, at which time I understood you to offer the opinion, that the march from Hampton's encampment to Morrisville might be accomplished in six days, and my own opinion is, that, by embarrassing himself of his artillery and attiral, perhaps he might be able to make the march in that time, or a few days more.

My reasons for preferring the attack of Kingston to that of Montreal, are these:

By the reduction of that place we conquer a province, not only of great importance to the enemy, but a valuable acquisition to ourselves; we capture or destroy four thousand of his best troops; we put an end to the Indian war; and, by the destruction of his naval force, establish our command of the lake, and permit a respectable part of our naval force to be employed elsewhere.

On the contrary, leave Kingston, its garrison, and the British squadron in our rear, and proceed to Montreal, none of those important objects will be gained. The enemy will remain in undisturbed possession of the province, at liberty to exercise his enterprise against this frontier at discretion; for it is a fact, however opinions may vary, the resources of the province are adequate to the subsistence of his army. His naval superiority on the lake will be re-established by the opening of the Spring; the Indian depredations may be encouraged or continued; or, should he prefer it, he may, on the opening of the campaign, leaving Sir James Yeo triumphant on the lake, with a suitable garrison for the protection of Kingston, descend the St. Lawrence with his main force, and fall upon our rear, while we shall be engaged in front, admitting we succeed in establishing ourselves at Montreal.

Having passed Kingston, the fortifications at Prescott may present such an obstacle to our further progress, as to compel us to land and reduce it by force—an operation which may consume more time than can be spared at this advanced season. I speak conjecturally; but, should we surmount every obstacle in descending the river, we shall advance upon Montreal ignorant of the force arrayed against us, and in case of misfortune, having no retreat, the army must surrender at discretion. I will barely add, that, as the Winter commences at Montreal by the 20th of November, should we be delayed on the route by any untoward incidents, our embarrassments and perils will be greatly multiplied.

I offer these results of my frail judgment with a conscientious regard for the public good. I am bigoted to no project, and therefore am willing to yield my own judgment to that of others.

* What is here called a proposition was but a question, whether the march could be performed in six days? General W. answered in the negative, and advised that General Hampton should be ordered to go on to Cognawaga.

Personal consideration would make me prefer a visit to Montreal to the attack of Kingston; but before I abandon this attack, which by my instructions I am ordered to make, it is necessary to my justification that you should, by the authority of the President, direct the operations of the army under my command particularly against Montreal.

With my earnest wishes for the successful issue of whatever may be undertaken, I am, dear sir, with much respect and esteem, truly yours,

J. A. WILKINSON.

HON. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

N. B. All the objections which apply to the landing below Kingston may be obviated by landing above it. My sole motive for suggesting the idea of landing below, was to prevent the garrison's escape. If there be a deficiency of forage on our part, it is the fault of the Quartermaster General, who was instructed as early as August to lay in a supply of twelve thousand bushels for the subsistence of the cavalry.

J. A. WILKINSON.

HON. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

Endorsement on the preceding letter by the Secretary of War.

NOTE.—If we look at the plan of campaign of the 23d of July, we find that it proposed an attack on Kingston, and even indicated the mode of that attack. If we examine General Wilkinson's letter of the 6th of August, we find that he provisionally adopted that opinion; and if we refer to the letter of the Secretary of War of the 8th, so far from expressing a different opinion, we discover that it instructed the General to choose between a direct and an indirect attack on that post. It was not, therefore, any difference of opinion between the Secretary and the General that was submitted to the council of war, as stated in the preceding letter, but the mere alternative presented by the instructions of the letter; the simple choice between the two modes of attack.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 20, 1813.

SIR: I received your letter of yesterday by Major Lee. You appear to have written it under an impression that your instructions of August last made a direct attack upon Kingston unavoidable. A copy of these instructions is before me, and in the last paragraph of them we find a summary of their substance. It is as follows: "After this exposition, it is unnecessary to add, that, in conducting the present campaign, you will make Kingston your principal object, and that you will choose, as circumstances may indicate, between a direct and an indirect attack on that post." Both modes of attack are slightly detailed in these orders, and a preference given to the latter, but without at all infringing your right of choice, or in any degree lessening your responsibility. Nor am I now at liberty to change the ground of these instructions, since the only effect of this would be to substitute my opinion for yours. The former has not, however, been withheld; it has been given freely and fully, and is yet unshaken by any consideration presented to my mind.

As we are now about to part, it may be proper that I should subjoin to what I have said in favor of a movement on Montreal, a short statement of my objections to a direct attack on Kingston.

1st. If its garrison consists of four thousand of the best troops of the enemy, (as you suggest) your attack will fail.

2d. If your attack fails, your retreat is impracticable.

3d. Your descent must necessarily be made above or below the town, on the water's edge, and within a short distance of your object. If made below the town, your fleet cannot cover it;* if made above the town, it must be done in presence of the enemy, and within stroke of his fleet, and that he will think the object sufficient to justify the risk cannot be doubted. Besides, an approach on this side, however successful, leaves to the enemy the means of escaping.

4th. The experiment already made of the lake navigation is not encouraging. Though pressed by no enemy other than the weather, the army has not been able to reach Grenadier island but in broken order, and with considerable loss. On your plan, they have eighteen other miles to go on the open lake, and much of this distance under the eye of the British fleet. Is it probable that our scows will be able to navigate this remaining distance (at a season and under circumstances so unfavorable) in better order, or with less loss?

These are the best thoughts I can offer, and it only remains to add to them my best wishes for your army and for yourself.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General WILKINSON.

LADY OF THE LAKE,

Off Sackett's Harbor, Oct. 24, 1813.

SIR: I was at Grenadier island the day before yesterday, and found the troops dropping in so slowly that I determined to return, hunt them up, and quicken their movement. My presence at the harbor was also necessary to have clothing selected to cover numbers of our naked men.

I will say nothing of the horrid condition in which that place was left. Colonel Coles has arrived with upwards of two hundred good men, and expects about eighty more to-day. Randolph and Scott are expected at Oswego, nine hundred strong. I have contrived to rig and send off vessels to bring up six hundred of them in season for my movement from Grenadier island, which will not be delayed one instant unnecessarily. The people at Kingston appear to be much affrighted, firing their alarm guns on the slightest appearance. J. N. has returned, and if he may be credited, De Rottenburg has not arrived, and all the force they can spare is sent down the river to take possession of, and fortify, some critical passes. My health continues, unfortunately, bad.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

J. A. WILKINSON.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated GRENADIER ISLAND, Oct. 28, 1813.

"I send you this by an extra Aid-de-Camp, Captain Nourse, to relieve the anxiety to which you must be subject, in the impending eventful moment.

"The extent of the injuries to our craft, the clothing and arms of the men, and to our provisions, on the passage from Sackett's Harbor to this place, greatly exceeded our apprehensions, and has subjected us to the necessity of furnishing a supply of clothing, and of making repairs and equipments to our flotilla generally. In fact, all our hopes have been very nearly blasted; but thanks to the same Providence which placed us in jeopardy, we are surmounting our difficulties, and, God willing, I shall pass Prescott on the night of the 1st or 2d proximo, if some unforeseen obstacle does not present to forbid me. I shall expect to hear from you at Morrisville, where Colonel Swift is to meet me, and to guard against chance shots, I wish wagons would be held in readiness to receive our powder and field ammunition, at a suitable distance above Prescott.

"I keep up the delusion here; and the enemy, about sixteen hundred strong, exclusive of five hundred militia, are in daily expectation of a visit at Kingston, yet they have taken post, I understand, at Cornwall and the Coteau de Lac. No matter; once past Prescott, and our bayonets and sabres shall remove all impediments.

"The inexorable winds and rains continue to oppose and embarrass our movements; but I am seizing on every moment's interval, to slip into the St. Lawrence, corps and detachments, as they can be got ready. Our rendezvous will be in Bush creek, about twenty miles below, and nearly opposite to Gaunanoqui, which position menaces a descent on the opposite shore. I shall sail from that position at four o'clock of the morning, and will pass Prescott about the same time the ensuing morning.

"We have had such a fluctuation of sick and well between this place and Sackett's Harbor, that it is impossible to say in what force we shall move; but I calculate on 6,000 combatants, exclusive of Scott and Randolph, neither of whom will, I fear, be up in season, notwithstanding all my arrangements and exertions to accelerate their march; they are both under provisional orders for Ogdensburg."

WAR DEPARTMENT, DENMARK,
October 30, 9 o'clock P. M.

DEAR GENERAL: I this moment received your despatch by Captain Nourse. I rejoice that your difficulties are so far surmounted as to enable you to say with assurance when you will pass Prescott. I should have met you there; but bad roads, worse weather, and a considerable degree of illness, admonish me against receding further from a point where my engagements call me about the 1st proximo. The resolution of treading back my steps was taken at Antwerp, and communicated in a letter from that place by Maj. Lush. I wrote a single line to you to day, giving the fortunate issue of Harrison's business, and his arrival at Fort George with McArthur's brigade. If Vincent be within the peninsula, Harrison will root him out. It remains with you to sweep the rest of the line before you. Montreal taken, what are Prescott and Kingston? Give Hampton timely notice of your approach, and of the place and hour of junction.

Yours, sincerely,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General WILKINSON.

Extracts of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated GRENADIER ISLAND, Nov. 1, 1813.

"You will perceive from the duplicate under cover (letter of the 28th of October) what were my calculations four days since; but the winds and waves and rains and snow still prevail, and we have made several fruitless attempts to turn Stony Point, one of them at great peril to three thousand men, whom I seasonably remanded to the harbor without the loss of a life. Our sick, one hundred and ninety-six in number, have not fared as well; they were embarked in stout comfortable vessels, and sailed the day before yesterday morning for Sackett's Harbor, but they were driven on shore by a storm, which continued with unrelenting violence all night; and as no exertion could relieve them, I anticipated the loss of the whole; but the tempest having abated, and the wind shifted from southwest to northeast, boats were sent out yesterday morning, and Dr. Bull reports the loss of three men only. Other means of transport will be provided to-morrow, and these unfortunate men will be sent to the hospital at Sackett's Harbor.

"Brigadier Brown with his brigade, the light artillery, the riflemen, the volunteers, the gunboats, Bissell's regiment, and a part of Macomb's, are, I expect, safe at French creek, with the artillery and ordnance stores. These corps have made the traverse of the arm of the lake under circumstances of great danger, though fortunately without the loss of a life, but at the expense of some boats.

"I shall wait one day longer, and if the passage should still continue impracticable to the troops, I will land them on the opposite shore, march them across the country to the St. Lawrence, and send the empty boats round to a given rendezvous.

"As Major General Hampton is under your orders, permit me to suggest to you what is worthy of reflection—whether he should take a position and wait the arrival of my command near the confluence of the St. Lawrence and Grand river, or whether he should move down the St. Lawrence and menace Chambly? If he is strong enough to meet Sir George, the latter will be the preferable plan, because it will have the effect to divide the enemy's force; otherwise he should adopt the first idea, hazard nothing, and strengthen my hands.

"The enclosed copy of a memorandum from Colonel Swift will show you what he is about, I flatter myself, to your satisfaction. The sole unpleasant circumstance before me, is our total ignorance of the preparations of Sir George, and what we may expect to meet on the island. I fear no consequences; but it must be painful to lead more than six thousand men to battle hoodwinked; and yet all my efforts to procure intelligence from Montreal have proved fruitless."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to General Wilkinson, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, Nov. 1, 1813.

"Prevost will perhaps be found between the Coteau de Lac and the Isle Perrot. If wise, he will attempt to fight you before your junction with Hampton. Avoid this, and leave nothing to chance that you can settle on your own terms. A junction with Hampton enables you to give the law."

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

GRENADIER ISLAND,

Nov. 3, 1813, 7 o'clock A. M.

"The troops and squadron are at last in the river, excepting Macomb's regiment, with which I shall join them by 10 o'clock, as the weather is propitious. Extreme illness, and the arrival of Colonel Randolph with two hundred and thirty men, kept me here last evening. We shall be encamped at French creek to-night; will take to-morrow for final organization and arrangement, and the next day pass or prepare to take Prescott; by preference I shall not disturb the place, because I have not time to spare."

ALBANY, November 12, 1813.

DEAR GENERAL: My accounts from and of you are of the same date. Neither come down lower than the 3d instant. These left you with the reserve at Grenadier island.

General Hampton has made a movement towards the St. Lawrence. After feeling and skirmishing with the enemy, he retired again to the Four Corners, until he had notice of your approach. I hastened to inform him by express (who would reach him in forty-eight hours) that you were in motion; that on the 5th you would pass or take Prescott, and that on the 8th you would be at Hamilton, whence he might expect to hear from you; that he must put himself again in motion, and take a position which would enable him to join you, or which should detain the enemy on the south side of the river. If Prevost, on learning your approach, quits his present position, and re-occupies the north bank of the St. Lawrence, Hampton goes on and joins you. If he remains on the south bank, he abandons Montreal and even the road to his capital. In the fullness of my faith that you are in Montreal, and that you have both seen and seized on all the advantages that the errors of an enemy may have given you,

I am, dear General, cordially yours,
J. ARMSTRONG.

Major General WILKINSON.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

FRENCH MILLS, November 15, 1813.

"It is a fact, for which I am authorized to pledge myself on the most confidential authority, that, on the fourth of the present month, the British garrison of Montreal consisted solely of four hundred marines and two hundred sailors, which had been sent up from Quebec. What a golden, glorious opportunity, has been lost by the caprice of Major General Hampton."

HEADQUARTERS, FRENCH MILLS,
November 16, 1813.

SIR: I beg leave to refer you to the journal which accompanies this letter, for the particulars of the movement of the corps under my command down the St. Lawrence, and will endeavor to exert my enfeebled mind to detail to you the more striking and important incidents which have ensued my departure from Grenadier island, at the foot of Lake Ontario, on the 3d instant.

The corps of the enemy from Kingston, which followed me, hung on my rear; and, in concert with a heavy galley and a few gunboats, seemed determined to retard my progress. I was strongly tempted to halt, turn about, and put an end to his teasings; but alas! I was confined to my bed. Major General Lewis was too ill for any active exertion; and, above all, I did not dare suffer myself to be diverted a single day from the prosecution of the views of the Government. I had written Major General Hampton on the 6th instant, by his Adjutant General, Colonel King, and had ordered him to form a junction with me on the St. Lawrence, which I expected would take place on the 9th or 10th. It would have been unpardonable had I lost sight of this object a moment, as I deemed it of vital importance to the issue of the campaign.

The enemy deserve credit for their zeal and intelligence, which the active universal hostility of the male inhabitants of the country enable them to employ to the greatest advantage. Thus, while menaced by a respectable force in rear, the coast was lined by musketry in front at every critical pass of the river, which obliged me to march a detachment, and this impeded my progress.

On the evening of the 9th instant, the army halted a few miles from the head of the Longue

Saut. In the morning of the 10th, the enclosed order was issued. General Brown marched agreeably to order, and about noon we were apprized, by the report of his artillery, that he was engaged some distance below us. At the same time the enemy were observed in our rear, and their galley and gunboats approached our flotilla and opened a fire on us, which obliged me to order a battery of eighteen pounders to be planted, and a shot from it compelled the vessels of the enemy to retire, together with their troops, after some firing between the advanced parties. But, by this time, in consequence of disembarking and re-embarking the heavy guns, the day was so far spent, that our pilots did not enter the Saut, (eight miles a continued rapid,) and, therefore, we fell down about two miles, and came to for the night. Early the next morning everything was in readiness for motion; but having received no intelligence from General Brown, I was still delayed, as sound caution prescribed I should learn the result of his affair before I committed the flotilla to the Saut. At half past ten o'clock, A. M., an officer of dragoons arrived with a letter, in which the General informed me he had forced the enemy, and would reach the foot of the Saut early in the day. Orders were immediately given for the flotilla to sail, at which instant the enemy's gunboats appeared, and began to throw shot among us. Information was brought me at the same time, from Brigadier General Boyd, that the enemy's troops were advancing in column. I immediately sent orders to him to attack them. This report was soon contradicted. Their gunboats, however, continued to watch us, and a variety of reports of their movements and counter-movements were brought to me in succession, which convinced me of their determination to hazard an attack when it could be done to the greatest advantage, and, therefore, I determined to anticipate them. Directions were accordingly sent by that distinguished officer, Colonel Swift, of the Engineers, to Brigadier General Boyd, to throw the detachment of his command, assigned to him in the order of the preceding day, and composed of men from his own, Covington's and Swartwout's brigades, into three columns, to march upon the enemy, out flank them, if possible, and take their artillery. The action soon after commenced with the advanced body of the enemy, and became extremely sharp and galling; and, with occasional pauses, was sustained with great vivacity, in open space and fair combat, for upwards of two and a half hours, the adverse lines alternately yielding and advancing. It is impossible to say with accuracy what was our number on the field, because it consisted of indefinite detachments taken from the boats to render safer the passage of the Saut. Brigadier Generals Covington and Swartwout voluntarily took part in the action at the head of the detachments from their respective brigades, and exhibited the same courage that was displayed by Brigadier General Boyd, who happened to be the senior officer on the ground. Our force engaged might have reached sixteen or seventeen hundred men, but certainly did not exceed eighteen hundred. That of the enemy was estimated at from twelve hundred to two thousand, but probably did not amount to more than fifteen or sixteen hundred, consisting, as I am informed, of detachments from the 49th, 84th, and 104th regiments of the line, with three companies of the voltigeur and Glengary corps, and the militia of the country, who are not included in the estimate.

Failure of the Northern Army.

It would be presumptuous in me to attempt to give you a detailed account of this affair, which certainly reflects high honor on the American soldier, as no example can be produced of undisciplined men, with inexperienced officers, braving a fire of two hours and a half, without quitting the field, or yielding to their antagonists. But, sir, the information I now give you is derived from officers of my confidence, who took active parts in this conflict; for, though I was enabled to order the attack, it was my hard fortune not to be able to lead the troops I commanded; the disease with which I was assailed on the 2d of September, on my journey to Fort George, having, with a few short intervals of convalescence, preyed on me ever since; and, at the moment of this action, I was confined to my bed, and emaciated almost to a skeleton, unable to set my horse, or to move ten paces without assistance.

I must, however, be pardoned for trespassing on your time a few remarks in relation to the affair. The objects of the British and American commanders were precisely opposed; the last being bound by the instructions of his Government, and the most solemn obligations of duty, to precipitate his descent of the St. Lawrence by every practicable means; because, this being effected, one of the greatest difficulties opposed to the American Army would be surmounted: and the first, by duties equally imperious, to retard, and, if possible, prevent such descent—he is to be accounted victorious who effected his purpose. The British commander, having failed to gain either of his objects, can lay no claim to the honor of the day. The battle fluctuated, and triumph seemed, at different times, inclined to the contending corps. The front of the enemy was at first forced back more than a mile, and, though they never regained the ground thus lost, their stand was permanent, and their charges resolute. Amidst these charges, and near the close of the contest, we lost a field piece by the fall of the officer, who was serving it, with the same coolness as if he had been at a parade or review; this was Lieutenant Smith of the light artillery, who, in point of merit, stood at the head of his grade.

The enemy having halted, and our troops being again formed in battalia, front to front, and the firing ceased on both sides, we resumed our position on the bank of the river, and the infantry being much fatigued, the whole were re-embarked, and proceeded down the river, without further annoyance from the enemy or their gunboats, while the dragoons, with five pieces of light artillery, marched down the Canada shore without

It is due to his rank, to his worth, and to his services, that I should make particular mention of Brigadier General Covington, who received a mortal wound directly through the body, while animating his men, and leading them on to the charge. He fell where he fought, at the head of his men, and survived but two days.

The next morning the flotilla passed through the Saut, and joined that excellent officer, Brigadier General Brown, at Barnharts, near Cornwall, where he had been instructed to take post and wait my arrival; and where I confidently expected to hear of Major General Hampton's arrival on the opposite shore. But, immediately after I halted, Colonel Atkinson, the Inspector General of the division under Major General Hampton, waited on me with a letter from that officer, in which, to my unspeakable mortification and surprise, he declined the junction ordered, and informed me he was marching towards Lake Champlain, by way of co-operating in the proposed attack on Montreal.

This letter, together with a copy of that to which it is an answer, were immediately submitted to a council of war, composed of my general officers, and the Colonel commanding the elite, the Chief Engineer, and the Adjutant General, who unanimously gave it as their opinion, that "the attack on Montreal should be abandoned for the present season, and the army, then near Cornwall, should be immediately crossed to the American shore for taking up Winter quarters, and that this place afforded an eligible position for such quarters."

I acquiesced in these opinions, not from the shortness of the stock of provisions, (which had been reduced by the acts of God) because that of our meat had been increased five days, and our bread had been reduced only two days, and because we could, in case of extremity, have lived on the enemy; but because the loss of the division under Major General Hampton weakened my force too sensibly to justify the attempt. In all my measures and movements of moment, I have taken the opinions of my general officers, which have been in accord with my own.

I remained on the Canada shore until the next day, without seeing or hearing from the "powerful force" of the enemy in our neighborhood, and the same day reached this position with the artillery and infantry. The dragoons have been ordered to Utica, and its vicinity, and I expect are fifty or sixty miles on the march.

You have, under cover, a summary abstract of the killed and wounded in the affair of the 11th instant, which shall soon be followed by a particular return, in which a just regard will be paid to individual merits. The dead rest in honor, and the wounded bled for their country and deserve its gratitude.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Secretary of War.

Journal referred to in the foregoing letter of Major General Wilkinson.

October 21st. Boisterous weather; left Sackett's Harbor; at night arrived off Grenadier island.

October 22d. Called for a return of the troops on the island; found a large body to be still in the rear, wrecked or stranded; returned in quest of them, and to order from the harbor a supply of winter clothing and shoes for the troops on the island, who were nearly destitute; observed at night, on our way up, many fires on different points of the coast; wind so high could not call at them; reached the harbor at midnight.

October 23d. Orders given for the shipment of the clothing; many stragglers picked up and embarked for Grenadier island; Colonel Coles arrived with two hundred men of the 12th regiment, and sailed for the same place; the Growler equipped, manned, furnished with a skipper, and sent to Oswego for Colonels Randolph and Scott (who were expected at that place) and as many men as she could carry. We sailed for Grenadier island; arrived about eight o'clock at night on the island; weather blustering, with frequent rain. All this time the General's illness continued without abatement.

October 24th. Hard rains with heavy gales. Still at anchor off the island.

October 25th. The General landed, and measures were immediately taken to seize every pause of the prevailing storms to slip the flotilla into the St. Lawrence by small detachments. In these deceitful momentary calms we found it impossible to traverse in safety the arm of the lake to Gravelly point, though distant only nine miles. In the several attempts made, many boats were driven ashore, and much provision and clothing lost. French creek, nearly opposite the point where the enemy expected we should land to attack Kingston, was made the general rendezvous of the troops, and Brigadier General Brown ordered on to take the chief command. The expedition of the Growler was so far successful, that, on the 31st, Colonel Randolph, after a perilous voyage, reached Grenadier island with two hundred and thirty men of the 20th regiment. On the 2d November, Commodore Chauncey, by concert, entered the St. Lawrence, fell down nearly to French creek, and took a position to command the north and south channels. In the evening of the 1st November our vigilant enemy having observed, even amid the storms, our movement and position at French creek, attacked the detachment at that place, under General Brown, about sunset, with a squadron of two brigs and two schooners, with many boats loaded with infantry for landing, should their cannonade make a sufficient impression. Very soon Captain McPherson, of the light artillery, erected a battery of three eighteen pounders, and returned their fire with such spirit and effect that they fell down to a harbor below, beyond its range. Next morning the attack was renewed and repelled, and one of the brigs was, with great difficulty, towed off by the squadron, which put into Kingston channel, behind Grand island. We lost two killed and four wounded. The enemy were supposed to have suffered severely from the evident disabled state of their brig, and the deliberate and well directed fire of the gallant Captain McPherson.

November 3d. The rear of the army, with the General more and more sick, sailed for the general rendezvous, where the chief part arrived in the evening. The General was carried on shore, and lodged in a tent, his malady increasing in violence.

November 4th. This day was devoted to final arrangements for the sailing of the flotilla. Weather moderating.

November 5th. Charming day. The flotilla got under way, and, without accident, fell down and landed early in the night below Morrisville. The General, suspecting he would be followed by the enemy, as in the morning his course had been discovered by three of their look-out gun-boats and a gig, and knowing that two of their armed schooners could jeopard his movement, gave orders for the flotilla to pass Prescott, then seven miles below him, in the course of the night. But some confusion occurred, arising from the novelty of the movement, and the order was countermanded.

November 6th. This morning the health of the General appeared better; he ordered the flotilla to descend to a point within three miles of Prescott; and the day being fine, got into his gig, and proceeded to reconnoitre the place. In the mean time, the powder and fixed ammunition were debarked and placed in carts, to be transported by land, under cover of the night, beyond the enemy's batteries. As soon as the General returned, orders were issued for the debarkation of every man (except so many as were necessary to navigate the boats) who were directed to march, under cover of the night, to save useless exposure to the enemy's cannon, to a bay two miles below Prescott; and arrangements were made, at the same time, for the passage of the flotilla by that place, the superintendency of which devolved on Brigadier General Brown, the general officer of the day. About eight o'clock, P. M., we had so heavy a fog, that it was believed we could pass the British fortress unobserved, and orders were accordingly given for the army to march and the flotilla to get under way. The General, in his gig, proceeded ahead, followed by his passage-boat and family; but a sudden change of the atmosphere exposed his passage-boat to the garrison of the enemy, and near fifty twenty-four pound shot were fired at her without effect, while the column on land, discovered by the gleam of their arms, were assailed with shot and shells, without injury. General Brown, on hearing the firing, judiciously halted the flotilla until the moon had set, when it got in motion, but was perceived by the enemy, who opened upon it, and continued their fire, from front to rear, for the space of three hours; and yet, out of more than three hundred boats, not one was touched, and only one man was killed, and two were wounded; and before ten next morning the whole of the flotilla (except two vessels) reached the place of rendezvous. About noon, this day, Colonel King, Adjutant General of the army of General Hampton, arrived, and waited on the Commander-in-Chief, whom he informed that he had been to Sackett's Harbor with a despatch from General Hampton to the Secretary of War; that he had no communication, written or verbal, from Major General Hampton to him (the Commander-in-Chief) but that, not finding the Secretary of War at Sackett's Harbor, he had thought proper, on his return, to call for any communication he (General Wilkinson) might have to make to General Hampton. The General had intended, in the course of this day, to send an express to General Hampton, with an order to him to form a junction of his division with the corps descending the St. Lawrence, and availed himself of the opportunity presented by Colonel King, to send the order.

November 7th. The General having been exposed to the open air all last night, in consequence found himself ill. In passing Prescott, two of our largest vessels, loaded with provisions, artillery, and ordnance stores, either through cowardice or treachery, had been run into the river near Ogdensburg, and opposite Prescott. The enemy kept up so constant a cannonade on them, that we found it difficult, and lost half a day, to get them out. We perceived the militia in arms at Johnson, directly opposite us, and several pieces of field artillery in motion. Understanding that the coast below was lined with posts of musketry and artillery at every narrow pass of the river, Colonel Macomb was detached, about one o'clock, with the elite corps, of about one thousand two hundred men, to remove these obstructions, and the General got under way about half-past three o'clock. Four or five miles below we entered the first rapids of the river, and, soon after passing them, two pieces of light artillery, which had not been observed by Col. Macomb, opened a sharp fire upon the General's passage-boat, but without any further effect than cutting away some of the rigging. Lieut. Col. Eustis, with a part of our light gun barges, came within shot of the pieces of the enemy, and a cannonade ensued, without injury on either side. In the mean time Major Forsyth, who was in the rear of the elite of Colonel Macomb, landed his riflemen, advanced upon the enemy's guns, and had his fire drawn by a couple of videttes, posted in his route, on which their pieces were precipitately carried off. The General came to at dusk, about six miles below the town of Hamilton, where he received a report from Colonel Macomb, who had routed a party at a block-house, about two miles below, and captured an officer.

November 8th. This morning the flotilla fell down to a contraction of the river, at a point called the "White House," where the dragons were assembled to be crossed. Brigadier General Brown was ordered this morning to reinforce Colonel Macomb with his brigade, and to take the command; and the whole day and following night were devoted to transporting the dragoons. About noon this day we received advice that two armed schooners, and a body of the enemy in batteaux, estimated at one thousand or fifteen hundred men, had descended the river from Kingston, and landed at Prescott; that they had immediately sent a flag across the river to Ogdensburg, and demanded the delivery of all public property there, under penalty of burning the town. Not long after, information was received that the enemy had re-embarked at Prescott in their bateaux, and were following us with seven gunboats.

November 9th. This morning, very early, the enemy menaced our rear, and a slight skirmish took place between our riflemen and a party of their militia and Indians, in which we had one man killed, and the enemy were driven back. The cavalry, with four pieces of light artillery, under the command of Captain McPherson, were attached to the command of Brigadier General Brown, and he was ordered to march to clear the coast below us as far as a point near the head of the Longue Saut. The rapidity of the current obliged us to halt the flotilla several hours, to enable General Brown to make good his march in time to cover our movement. During this period the enemy frequently threatened our rear, but never indicated an intention to make a serious attack. About three o'clock, P. M., the flotilla got under way, and came to, about five o'clock, at the Yellow House, having floated nearly eleven miles in two hours, where we encamped for the night.

November 10th. This morning the following order was issued :

"Morning General Orders.

"HEADQUARTERS, TUTTLE'S BAY,
November 10, 1813.

"General Brown will prosecute his march with the troops yesterday under his command, excepting two pieces of artillery and the second dragoons, who, with all the well men of the other brigades, except a sufficient number to navigate the boats, are to march under the orders of Brigadier General Boyd. This precaution is enjoined by regard to the safety of the men in passing the Longue Saut; and as this rapid is long and dangerous, the General earnestly requests the commanding officers of regiments and corps to examine the boats, and see them properly fitted, in order to avoid accidents as much as possible. Brigadier General Boyd will take the necessary precaution to prevent the enemy, who hangs on our rear, from making an advantageous attack, and, if attacked, is to turn about and beat them. The boats are to resume the station assigned them in the original order respecting the flotilla, and for this the commanding officers of regiments and brigades will be held responsible. The movement of yesterday was a reproach to the service. The flotilla will come to to-day at Barnhart's, near Crab Island, and two guns from the front will be the signal for landing. In case of an attack in force beyond all expectation, the corps under Brigadier Generals Boyd and Brown are to co-operate with each other, promptly and with decision. The General officer of the day will strictly attend and see that the flotilla puts off and moves in the prescribed order, and will arrest any officer who presumes to deviate therefrom."

Brigadier General Brown marched, and about noon was engaged by a party of the enemy near a block-house on the Saut, erected to harass our flotilla in its descent. About the same time the enemy were observed to be advancing on our rear, and their galley and gunboats hove in sight, approached our flotilla, then at shore, and began to cannonade it. The slender structure of our gun barges made it impossible for them to resist the long twenty-four pounder of the enemy's galley; this obliged the General to order two eighteen pounders to be run on shore and formed in battery, a single shot from which gave such an alarm to the enemy's vessels, that they retired up the river, accompanied by their troops. But these slight operations so far wasted the day, that our pilots were afraid to enter the Saut (a continued rapid of eight miles) with the flotilla; we, therefore, fell down within two or three miles of the head of it, and came to for the night. By this time the General had become so extremely ill as to be unable to sit up, and was confined to his bed in a small berth under the quarter deck of his passage boat.

November 11th. Having heard the firing of the cannon yesterday between General Brown and the enemy, being still unapprized of the result, it became necessary that we should hear from him before we committed ourselves to the Saut, which allows no retreat, no turning to the right or left, but where the impetuosity of the current impels. About ten or eleven o'clock, A. M., the Commander-in-Chief received advice from General Brown that he had forced the enemy to retire before him, and had arrived near the foot of the Saut. Orders were immediately given for the flotilla to prepare to sail, and for General Boyd and his command to commence their march, when some firing took place from the gunboats, and a report was brought to the Commander-in-Chief that the enemy was advancing in column; on this he ordered General Boyd to attack them, and the flotilla was directed not to leave the shore. But the report was soon after contradicted. A variety of reports respecting their movements and counter movements were, after this, successively brought to the General, which impressed him with the conviction that the enemy had determined to attack his rear, as soon as the flotilla should put off and the troops commence their march. He resolved to anticipate them; he, therefore, sent Colonel Swift, of the engineers, with instructions to Brigadier General Boyd, who had been directed by the order of the preceding day to take command of the detachment on shore, to form that detachment into three columns, to advance upon the enemy, to endeavor to outflank them, and to take their artillery. Soon after this the action commenced, and for the numbers engaged was extremely warm and bloody for upwards of two hours, during which time, in open space and fair combat, the raw undisciplined troops of the United States braved, and frequently drove, the best troops of the British army. Descriptions of battles have become too subservient to the gratification of personal vanity, and the acquisition of popular applause; yet every man who has taken part in a great action must know that there is nothing more difficult than to do justice to the merits of a battle in all its parts, where it is hard to find two officers, unless fighting side by side, who agree in opinion as to the propriety of measures and the conduct of men. The fortunes of this day were various; sometimes one line, sometimes the other, giving way. Unfortunately, during the shiftings of the action, by the death of Lieut. Smith, a young officer of the highest promise, the enemy got possession of a field-piece, the only trophy they obtained. It is difficult to speak of the precise numbers engaged on either side, because the detachment under General Boyd consisted of an indefinite number of his own, Covington's, and Swartwout's brigades, ordered from on board the boats to lighten them, and save the hazard of the men's lives in descending the Saut. Neither Covington nor Swartwout were obliged to take part in the action with this detachment; yet they both entered the field, taking command of that part of it which belonged to their respective brigades, where they exhibited the same courageous conduct which distinguished General Boyd on the field; and, to the great loss of the service, Brigadier General Covington received a mortal wound when encouraging and leading on his detachment. The numbers engaged on our side could not have exceeded sixteen or seventeen hundred men, while those of the enemy are reckoned, by spectators, at from one to two thousand; but it is probable did not exceed fifteen hundred, consisting, as we are informed, of detachments of the 49th, 84th, and 104th, the voltiguers, and Glen-garian regiment.

With respect to the courage displayed by our officers, it would be useless to enter into details, since they all manifested in their respective stations equal intrepidity. The names of the meritorious dead and wounded will be recorded in another place. The firing ceased, by common consent, about four o'clock, P. M.; our troops were formed in battalia in front of the enemy, who were also in line, and they separated, the enemy to their camp, and we to our boats. The troops being much exhausted, it was considered most convenient that they should embark; and that the dragoons, with the artillery, should proceed by land. The embarkation took place without the smallest molestation from the enemy, and the flotilla made a harbor near the head of the Saut, on the opposite shore. The views of the American and British commanders were, on this occasion, precisely opposed. The first being bound by the instructions of his Government, and the most solemn obligations of duty, to precipitate his descent of the St. Lawrence by every practicable means, and the last by duties equally imperative to retard, and, if possible, to prevent such descent. If, then, he found himself victorious on this day, it was certainly in his power to have effected the one or the other object; and as he made no attempt to effect either, it follows, incontestably, that he had no fair ground on which to claim a victory.

November 12th. The flotilla sailed early this morning, and passed down the Saut without discovering either the boats or troops of the enemy, and arrived, in the course of the forenoon, at Barnhart's, where the commanding General received a letter from Major General Hampton, by the hands of Colonel Atkinson, his Inspector General, which blasted all his hopes, and destroyed every prospect of the campaign. A council of war was called upon the receipt of this communication, which was submitted to their consideration, whereupon the council determined that the conduct of Major General Hampton, in refusing to join his division to the troops descending the St. Lawrence to carry an attack against Montreal, rendered it expedient to leave the left bank of the St. Lawrence, and to remove the troops to French Mills, on Salmon river; and the thirteenth of November this recommendation was accordingly carried into effect, ample time having been given to the enemy to have tried a second action, if they had dared to run the hazard.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

FRENCH MILLS, Nov. 17, 1812.

"After what has passed between us, you can perhaps conceive my amazement and chagrin at the conduct of Major General Hampton. The game was in view, and, had he performed the junction directed, would have been ours in eight or ten days. But he chose to recede, in order to co-operate, and my dawning hopes, and the hopes and honor of the army, were blasted."

Extract from the General Order of General Wilkinson, of November 13.

"The troops are to embark without loss of time, yet are not to be hurried in leaving the Canadian shore, from whence the Commander-in-Chief is compelled to retire by the extraordinary, unexampled, and, it appears, unwarrantable conduct of Major General Hampton, in refusing to join this army with a division of four thousand men, under his command, agreeably to positive orders from the Commander-in-Chief, and, as he has been assured by the Secretary of War, of explicit instructions from the War Department.

"Thus deprived of a large portion of his promised force, the Commander-in-Chief feels himself bound, by a sense of regard to this meritorious corps, and of sacred duty to the United States, to spare the lives of brave men, and not to hazard the character or interest of the nation by an unequal conflict. He, with lively regret, and the deepest mortification, suspends the attack on Montreal; but he assures the army that it is not abandoned."

Colonel Purdy's report to Major General Wilkinson, of the action at Chateaugay, &c., transmitted by the General to the Secretary of War.

I arrived at Cumberland Head September 16th, 1813, and on the 18th took command of the 4th regiment of infantry, stationed at that place. The army, consisting of about four thousand men, was composed principally of recruits who had been but a short time in service, and had not been exercised with that rigid discipline so essentially necessary to constitute the soldier. They had, indeed, been taught various evolutions, but a spirit of subordination was foreign to their views. On the 19th, orders were issued for the whole army, except a squadron of horse and the artillery, to embark in batteaux. The army got under way, preceded by the light corps, and flanked on the right by the navy, and arrived at Chazy at 12 o'clock at night, lay on their arms, embarked again soon after sunrise the next morning, proceeded down the lake as far as Champlain, and up Champlain river the distance of four miles, where we landed, and immediately marched to Odletown. The light corps, which preceded the other troops some hours, surprised and defeated a guard of the enemy at that place. We remained at Odletown until the middle of the next day, during which time a want of system in the management of the army was readily discovered by every military man, that led to apprehensions for the safety of the troops, should the enemy oppose with any considerable force. The army returned to Champlain the 21st, to Chazy the 22d, and the day following commenced the route to Chateaugay. The whole of this march, a distance of more than seventy miles, was very disagreeable; the officers were not permitted to take with them the necessaries, much less the conveniences of life, and were compelled to abandon clothing and other things essentially necessary to preserve the body in health. We forebore complaint, endured every privation, presuming the commanding officer had sufficient reasons for his conduct, and concluding it was pro bono publico. The scene has passed, and time sufficient has elapsed to have discovered those reasons, had they existed; none have been found; on the contrary, circumstances have demonstrated that it was a useless and unnecessary sacrifice of both public and private property. The army remained at Chateaugay twenty-six days, and on the 21st October commenced an excursion into the enemy's country. The first brigade followed the course of the Chateaugay river to Spear's, the distance of eighteen miles and upward, and there met the second brigade, which had taken a nearer and more convenient route. The march was very fatiguing, equalled only by another that soon followed. Credit is due to both the officers and soldiers for their orderly conduct, patience, and perseverance, in surmounting the incredible obstacles the enemy threw in their way. On the 25th, a difficult and very fatiguing expedition was planned, and the execution of it assigned to the first brigade, which had been for some time previous, and still remained, under my command. The design was to cut off the retreat of a body of the enemy, supposed to be encamped on the banks of the Chateaugay, six miles distant. With this intention the first brigade was ordered to cross the river at night, march silently down, and recross at a ford two miles below the enemy, and attack them in rear, giving a preconcerted signal, while the second brigade moved down the road in front. We commenced the march at sundown, and by sunrise the next morning had gained only six miles. Here we were discovered by the enemy, and fired on from the opposite side of the river. During that night we were repeatedly misled by the guides, who knew nothing of the country, having never been that way, and at the time we were attacked, they had led us into a thick cedar growth or swamp on the banks of the river, and immediately opposite the enemy's position, and knew not how to extricate us. Incredible as it may appear, General Hampton intrusted nearly one-half of his army, and those his best troops, to the guidance of men, each of whom repeatedly assured him that they were not acquainted with the country, and were not competent to direct such an expedition. At the same time General Hampton told me he had a man by the name of Smith, who had a perfect knowledge of the country, and whom he promised to send me, but which he neglected to do. The defeat of the expedition was the consequence of this neglect of the Major General. About two o'clock, while receiving an order from Colonel King, Adjutant General, upon the opposite side of the river, to march back four miles, and then ford the river and join the 2d brigade, the enemy made a furious attack on the column by a great discharge of musketry, accompanied by the yells of the savages. Unfortunately the word "retreat" was heard, which, for a short time, spread confusion among the several corps. A sufficient number, however, remained firm, and the enemy was soon compelled to retire. Towards sundown I sent General Hampton a request that a regiment might be ordered down to cover my landing on the opposite side of the river; but judge my surprise, on receiving intelligence that he had retreated with the second brigade nearly three miles. Thus was I deserted, without the smallest guard to cover my landing. To what cause shall it be attributed, that the General ordered a retreat, and that, too, at the moment when the presence of the second brigade was required, or could be useful, as soon afterwards he declared "he should be willing to compound with the first brigade for five hundred men." The wounded had previously been conveyed across on rafts, which made a removal of my brigade absolutely necessary for their protection. An attempt was accordingly made, and a floating bridge soon constructed of old logs, found on the margin of the river. The enemy discovering our disposition, commenced a firing from the opposite side, and killed several while crossing. Major Snelling, with about one hundred men, effected a landing, and joined the main body. The remainder of my force, exhausted by the excessive exertions of the preceding night, and weary with the fatigues of the day, not having had a moment either for rest or refreshment, were compelled to endure the privation of sleep another night. We retired two or three miles and took a position. At about 12 o'clock the enemy came up and made an attack upon us, but were soon routed. The men at this time were formed, and lying on the ground they were to occupy in case of an attack, and were ordered to, and did immediately rise, seize their arms, and remain under them the residue of the night. An excessively heavy rain prevented the firing both of the enemy and ourselves, except occasionally a single gun from the former. Our troops were ordered not to fire, but, in case of a repetition of attack, to charge bayonets; this was accordingly done. The enemy charged several times, and as often were put to flight. It is observable in this place, that, so greatly were the men overpowered by fatigue, though in a situation every way dangerous, and in which they had every reason to believe they should be sallied upon by the enemy every moment, many were unable to conquer their disposition to sleep, and it was not in the power of the officers to keep them awake. It was on the morning of this last attack that the General expressed his apprehensions for the first brigade, and made the declaration above quoted. The next morning we crossed the river, and joined General Hampton; on the 28th the army retreated four miles, and on the 30th and 31st marched back to Chateaugay. The troops, at the time of the attack, were not in a situation to endure further fatigue; and it is an indubitable fact, that many of them were so debilitated they were unable to proceed with the brigade on its march from the place of its last attack, and actually did not reach the main body until the day after the brigade had joined it, and some not even until the army had reached the Four Corners of Chateaugay.

Never, to my knowledge, during our march into Canada, and while we remained at the Four Corners, a term of twenty-six days, did General Hampton ever send off a scouting or reconnoitring party, (except in one or two cases at Spear's, in Canada, when he detached a few dragoons for this duty,) nor did he, from the time we commenced our march from Cumberland Head, to our arrival at Plattsburg, ever order a front, flank, or rear guard to be kept up, though a great part of the time we were in situations which evidently required it. True it is, these guards were occasionally sent out, not however by his order, but by the orders of the officers commanding brigades.

By a general order, dated Chateaugay, November 5, the General says he has paid the first attention to the sick, and has granted them indulgences, which created murmurings on the part of some officers at their posts. It is only necessary here to observe, that every officer of the army can testify that the sick were very much neglected as far as regards comfortable quarters and transportation, and that they were strewed along the roads through which we marched without care or attendance; and it is presumable that many have died in consequence of this who might have been saved to themselves if not to the service. The General, indeed, at the time this order was issued, which was after our return to the Four Corners, did order transportation for the sick to Burlington, but this is the only instance to my knowledge.

The Commissary's Department is worthy of notice. My order for provision was not sufficient; nor could I obtain any but by special license of General Hampton. The Commissary of Issues has been constantly in the habit of selling the livers, &c., of the beeves to officers; and though I represented this to General Hampton as unusual and improper, he refused to take any other notice of it than saying, "the Commissary is accountable for all parts of the beef, even to a pound or ounce of tallow;" nor did he take any notice of another piece of misconduct of the Commissary, that of acting in the capacity of sutler, but sanctioned it by purchasing of him.

The common practices with General Hampton of arresting officers and releasing them without their consent; of releasing arrested officers without the knowledge or consent of the officers by whom they were arrested (the case of Lieutenant Morris of the 33d regiment, who was arrested by me on the charge of cowardice and misconduct before the enemy on the 26th October, 1813, the time of the skirmish with the enemy at Ormstown, or Chateaugay river, being an instance;) of refusing to arrest officers whom I reported to him as having deserted their posts in time of action; of daily issuing orders and countermanning them, and of interfering in an improper manner with the subordinate commands of the army, as a reference to the orders issued by him will show, mark very strongly the capriciousness of his conduct and the total want of steadiness in his intentions.

Such has been the General's conduct on some occasions, that I have, in common with other officers, been induced to believe that he was under the influence of a too free use of spirituous liquors.

I must, in justice to General Hampton, say, that the expedition he planned, and which I have called "difficult and fatiguing," did, at the time it was suggested to me by him, meet my full approbation, and that I have since seen no reason for changing my opinion of its practicability or usefulness; but I must also say that it required competent guides; and these (as I said before) he promised to furnish me, but did not.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Wilkinson.

ALBANY, November 18, 1813.

"My last advices from you are of the 3d inst. Report says that the garrisons of Kingston and Prescott have found means to overtake your rear, to bring it to action, to handle it roughly, and to compel it to retreat to the main body. To this I give no credit:

"1st. Because, moving with the celerity necessary to your objects, it is highly improbable that they could by any exertion have been able to overtake you; and

Failure of the Northern Army.

"2d. Because it is quite incredible that, finding in your rear a heavy corps capable of disturbing the main action of the campaign, you should not have taken effectual measures to beat and destroy it. If 1,600 men were not sufficient for this purpose, 6,000 were so; and the garrisons of Kingston and Prescott destroyed (though we failed of getting to Montreal) the upper province was won."

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

FRENCH MILLS, Nov. 24, 1813.

"I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 15th instant from Albany, and hope my despatches have reached you which left this on the 17th.

"With respect to the unfortunate issue of the campaign, I disclaim the shadow of blame, because I know I have done my duty, and more than my duty, and so do those with whom I have acted. To General Hampton's outrage of every principle of subordination and discipline may be ascribed the failure of the expedition; and that I have not yet arrested him must be attributed to my respect for you, and my desire that the arrest should proceed from the highest authority; for if this act be suffered to pass unnoticed and unpunished, it will establish a precedent to justify disobedience and subvert those obligations of blind obedience on which the efficiency of military institutions exclusively depend.

"After our losses by deaths, desertions, and discharges, since we left Sackett's Harbor, I think we shall not be able to show you more than six thousand men at this point, exclusive of the dragoons, who have been ordered to Greenbush and Pittsfield, for convenience and economy."

WAR DEPARTMENT, Nov. 25, 1813.

SIR: It is recommended to you to consolidate your infantry and artillery into complete regiments, or as nearly so as possible, for the Winter, retaining a full complement of your most efficient officers to command them, and detaching all surplus officers immediately on the recruiting service, and to the several districts indicated by the rules and regulations. This regulation should extend to General Hampton's division.

An immediate inquiry into the terms of enlistment of the men composing your army should be instituted, and endeavors should be made to re-enlist all those whose terms of service are about expiring.

The most severe attention to discipline must be begun, and the slightest departures from it, whether in officer or soldier, noticed and punished. Clerks to the several companies must be appointed, and company books kept, showing everything received by the soldier, and charging him therewith. If, on the next, or any future inspection, it be found that any article of his clothing, or of his arms, has been lost or sold, the article is to be supplied, and the price deducted from his wages. With regard to clothing and arms, there have been the most shocking abuses.

Confidential reports are provided by the rules, and must be made agreeably thereto. The inspector who neglects or refuses to perform this duty shall be dismissed the service.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General WILKINSON.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, MALONE,

Military District No. 9, Dec. 6, 1813.

"Your three letters of the 25th ultimo came to hand on the 30th; and I am happy to find that I had anticipated the views communicated in those letters, as far as respects the security of our flanks and centre. When I ordered Major Gen. Hampton to reinforce the post of the Four Corners, it was under the impression that Cumberland Head was guarded; but the moment I was undeceived, and apprized of the exposed situation of our depot at Plattsburg, the order was countermanded, as you have seen from the documents which I have transmitted you. You must also have perceived, from those documents, that I was not insensible of the importance of condensing our force, and that I had made a proposition respecting quarters preparatory to such event."

Failure of the Northern Army.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

MALONE, December 8, 1813.

The unavoidable delay of the express (as no reliance can be placed in the mail from this place) enables me to send you the copy of a letter from General Izard, dated the 6th instant, which exhibits additional expositions of the pernicious and unwarrantable conduct of Major General Hampton. I will not charge this man with traitorous designs, but I apprehend, in any other Government, a military officer who first defeated the object of a campaign by disobedience of orders, and then, without authority, furloughed all the efficient officers of the division he commanded on a national frontier, in the vicinity of an enemy, would incur heavy penalties.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Izard to Major General Wilkinson, dated

PLATTSBURG, Dec. 6, 1813.

There is an unavoidable delay in the returns of the regiments of this division, proceeding from the extreme inexperience of the officers of all grades, now with them. Almost every efficient officer is either sick or was furloughed by Major General Hampton, at the moment of his own departure. Those that remain, are barely enough to perform the routine of duty in this cantonment.

Extract of a letter from Major General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

MALONE, December 24, 1813.

I believe I have not hitherto transmitted to you a copy of a communication which took place between Commodore Chauncey and myself, the day before I sailed from French Creek; and I do it now to show you what were my anticipations of the movements of the enemy left behind me, and how delusive were all the promises made to me that my rear should be protected.

FRENCH CREEK, Nov. 4, 1813.

DEAR SIR: I was so ill yesterday I could not call to see you, and I now send up to say that I shall sail this evening; and if I am not obstructed by the enemy's armed vessels, which may have slipped down the other channel, I shall pass Prescott to-morrow night, or land the next morning to take the place, if I cannot pass it without too great hazard. As this operation may require three or four days, it is not improbable the enemy's squadron may make some attempts to destroy my boats; and therefore I must entreat you to watch his every motion, and to give my flotilla every protection in your power.

We are a match for the gunboats of the enemy, but inferior to armed schooners; and, therefore, could you consistently spare us the Pert, or some armed vessel, to run down to the vicinity of Ogdensburg, and immediately return, it would add security to our movements.

Major Johnson will have the honor to deliver you this; and I will thank you for any information you can give me respecting the movements of the enemy.

I wish very much to say farewell to you, but I am sensible of the delicacy of your situation; and my disease having changed into a violent inflammation of the breast, I dare not get wet. If, then, it is destined that we are not to meet again, I will leave with you my prayers for long life and laurels in this world, and everlasting happiness in that which is to come.

Farewell, my friend, and may your country understand your skill and valor as well as does

JAMES WILKINSON.

Commodore CHAUNCEY.

U. S. SHIP GENERAL PIKE,
At anchor off East end of Long Island,
River St. Lawrence, Nov. 4, 1813.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of this day's date has this moment been handed to me by Major Johnson.

From the best information that I can get, the enemy's fleet is at or in the vicinity of Kingston; and I think that you have nothing to apprehend from them, as I am in a situation to watch both channels.

I should deem it unsafe to separate any part of my squadron as long as the enemy remains above me. In fact, I am in hourly expectation of being attacked by Sir James, down the south channel. In that case, I shall require all my force, as he has added a number of gunboats to his fleet. If, however, Sir James should detach any part of his fleet down the north channel, I will send a sufficient force down to oppose him.

I will remain in my present situation until you pass Prescott, but am anxious for that event to take place at as early a day as possible, as the fleet cannot move out of this river except with a fair wind. It is to be apprehended, that, after a few days, a spell of westwardly winds will set in, which will detain us until the ice makes, which would endanger the safety of the fleet, and probably lead to its final destruction. If it is possible for you to communicate to me, in any way, when you pass Prescott, I would esteem it as a particular favor.

May your present enterprise be crowned with all the success that you yourself can wish; and that your eminent services may be duly appreciated by your country is the prayer of, dear sir, your friend and humble servant,

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 23, 1813.

SIR: As the enemy's force and defences on the Canada side of the Niagara river are understood to be weak; as your force is respectable, and supposed to be competent to a successful attack of these; and the season has now furnished you with a bridge, as well for retreat as for advance; it is thought advisable that you do not permit circumstances so favorable to escape, without making a stroke on such points of the enemy's line as may be most within your reach. If, after feeling the enemy at Fort Erie, you should find yourself able to extend your attack to Fort George, it will be desirable; but of this you can judge best after your first experiment. To an old soldier, like yourself, it is unnecessary to go more into detail. You know what you ought to do, and you will do it. Communicate this letter to Lieutenant Colonel Boerstler, and accept the assurances of my respect and good wishes.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Col. PORTER, Light Artillery,
Commanding on Niagara River.

Extract of a letter from Major General Dearborn to the Secretary of War, dated

ALBANY, March 25, 1813.

Colonel Porter informs me that he had commenced the necessary preparations for an attack on Fort Erie, but the desertion of a sergeant prevented his carrying his intended attack into operation. Two officers, with six men, pursued the sergeant so far as to be surrounded on the ice, and were made prisoners. Fort Erie was immediately reinforced, and he had given over any immediate movement.

Letter from Colonel Scott (third Artillery Regiment) to Major General Wilkinson.

FORT GEORGE, Monday, 7 P. M.,
October 11, 1813.

SIR: Within the last five minutes I have had the honor to receive your despatch by the Lady of the Lake.

The enemy has treated me with neglect. He continued in his old positions until Saturday last, (the 9th,) when he took up his retreat on Burlington heights, and has abandoned this whole peninsula. Two causes are assigned for this precipitate movement: the succor of Proctor, who is reported to have been entirely defeated, if not taken; the other, the safety of Kingston, endangered by your movement.

We have had from the enemy many deserters, most of whom concur in the latter supposition.

The British burnt everything in store in this neighborhood—three thousand blankets, many hundred stand of arms; also the blankets in the men's packs, and every article of clothing not in actual use.

They are supposed to have reached Burlington heights last evening, from the rate of their march the night before. I have information of their having passed "the 40," by several inhabitants who have come down. They add to what was stated by the deserters, that two officers of the forty-first had joined General Vincent from Proctor's army, with the information that Proctor was defeated eighteen miles this side of Malden. I cannot get particulars.

From the same sources of intelligence, it appears that the 49th, a part of the 100th, and the voltigeurs, moved from our neighborhood the day after our flotilla left this, (the 3d instant,) but with what destination is not certainly known.

It was first reported—I mean in the British camp—that these regiments had marched to support Proctor, who, it is said, wrote that he would be compelled to surrender if not supported.

I am pretty sure, however, that they are gone below. The movement of our army below seems to have been known in the British lines as early as the 3d instant, together with the immediate objects in view; hence, I have no difficulty in concluding that all the movements of the enemy will concentrate at Kingston.

Chapin, who has been commissioned Lieutenant Colonel, marched late last evening up the lake, with about one hundred volunteers under his command, and was followed this morning by Generals McClure and Porter, with about one thousand men, Indians and militia included. There is no danger of their coming up with the enemy, or they would be in great danger of a total annihilation.

Vincent took hence with him about a thousand or eleven hundred regulars. Many of the militia left this with the avowed design of plunder; but I fear, from reports, that the British have left the miserable inhabitants without anything to be ravished. I expect General McClure back tomorrow evening, as he only took with him supplies for two days. He will probably go as far as "the 20."

On the 8th, Chapin went out with a small party and attacked one of the enemy's pickets, which brought on a skirmish, in which many of Colonel Swift's regiment participated. After a great waste of ammunition, the parties retired to their respective camps with little loss on either side. We made and lost a prisoner; had two Indians killed, and two other men wounded. We hear the enemy had five men wounded.

I had this morning made an arrangement, on application of General McClure, to be relieved in the command of this post on the morning of the 13th instant, with an intention of taking up my line of march for Sackett's Harbor, according to the discretion allowed me in the instructions I had the honor to receive from you at this place. My situation has become truly insupportable, without the possibility of an attack at this post, and without the possibility of reaching you time enough to share in the glory of impending operations below. I am, nevertheless, flattered with the assurance that transport will be forwarded for my removal; and, to favor that intention, I propose taking up my line of march on the morning of the 13th, for the mouth of the Genesee river, and there await the arrival of the vessels you are good enough to promise me. By this movement, Captain Mix thinks with me that I shall hasten my arrival at Sackett's Harbor five, possibly ten days. Captain Camp has a sufficient number of wagons to take me thither. I can easily make that place by the evening of the 15th. I hope I shall have your approbation, and everything is arranged with Brigadier McClure.

Knowing your wishes respecting the invalids or subjects for discharge, and fearing that water transport might not be had till the season was too far advanced for their removal, I have ventured to send Lieutenant Archer (paymaster of the 20th, who was left here without orders) on command to Greenbush, with one hundred men of this description. It was a measure approved of by Captain Mann, and I hope not contrary to your wishes and intentions. Doctor Hugo, Surgeon's Mate of the 14th, (also left here without orders) accompanied the detachment. The Quartermaster's department furnished eight wagons, on my requisition.

The sick list of the garrison is much reduced since your departure, (I have the honor to enclose my report of this morning,) and Doctor Mann has discharged many patients from his hospital; I also enclose you his last report. Those marked "subjects for discharge," are part of the number sent off from Greenbush.

Doctor Mann and Doctor Camp have concluded to remove the general hospital to "the Eleven Mile Creek," near Buffalo, the barracks at which place will be sufficient for the reception of the whole of the sick, with some trifling repairs.

From the morning report, enclosed, you will find seven hundred and ninety-four the "total," &c. present of the regulars of this garrison, including officers, &c. Transport will be necessary for about eight hundred and fifty persons. I wish also to take with me four iron 6's, one 5½ inch howitzer, and two caissons, the whole on field carriages. This train will form no impediment in my march to the mouth of Genesee river, as I have horses belonging to the regiment sufficient to draw it. If it meet your approbation, I can send the horses thence to Sackett's Harbor by land.

I have, by working almost night and day, greatly improved the defences of this post, and nearly filled up the idea of the engineer. I flatter myself that I have also improved the garrison in discipline.

I must apologise for the haste in which this is written, but Captain Mix proposes to sail immediately, and I fear to detain him a moment. I think I shall certainly be at the mouth of the Genesee by the 15th instant.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

W. SCOTT, Col. commanding.

Maj. Gen. WILKINSON, Commanding, &c.

Extract of a letter from Colonel Winfield Scott to the Secretary of War, dated GEORGETOWN, (COL.) Dec. 31, 1813.

"At your desire, I have the honor to make the following report:

"I left Fort George on the 13th of October last, by order of Major General Wilkinson, with the whole of the regular troops of that garrison, and was relieved by Brigadier General McClure, with a body of the New York detached militia.

"Fort George, as a field work, might be considered as complete at that period. It was garnished with ten pieces of artillery, (which number might easily have been increased from the spare ordnance of the opposite fort) with an ample supply of fixed ammunition, &c., as the enclosed receipt for these articles will exhibit.

"Fort Niagara, on the 14th October, was under the immediate command of Captain Leonard, first artillery, who, besides his own company, had Captain Read's, of the same regiment, together with such of Brigadier General McClure's brigade as had refused to cross the river. Lieutenant Colonels Fleming, Bloom, and Dobbins, of the militia, had successively been in the command of this fort, by order of the Brigadier General, but I think neither of them was present at the above period. Major General Wilkinson, in his order to me for the removal of the regular troops on that frontier, excepted the two companies of the first artillery then at Fort Niagara. And, under the supposition that I should meet water transport for my detachment at the mouth of the Genesee river, I had his orders to take with me the whole of the convalescents left in the different hospitals by the regiments which had accompanied him. This order I complied with."

NOTE—By the arrangements of the War Department, Brigadier General Porter of the United States' Army, was designated for command on the Niagara frontier, and particularly for that of Fort George. In the latter trust, General Wilkinson substituted for him Colonel Scott, of the third regiment of artillery, with provisional orders to join the army at Sackett's Harbor.

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 4, 1813.

SIR: Understanding that the defence of the post committed to your charge may render it proper to destroy the town of Newark, you are hereby directed to apprise its inhabitants of this circumstance, and to invite them to remove themselves and their effects to some place of greater safety. I am, &c.

Brig. Gen. McCLURE, or officer com'g Fort George, U. C.

General Harrison's orders to General McClure.

HEADQUARTERS, NEWARK,
November 15, 1813.

DEAR SIR: Being ordered to return to the westward, you will be pleased to resume the command which you received previous to my arrival at this place.

The orders which you heretofore have received will govern you. It will be necessary that you keep a vigilant eye over the disaffected part of the inhabitants; and I recommend that you make use of the zeal, activity, and local knowledge, which Colonel Wilcocks certainly possesses, to counteract the machinations of our enemy, and insure the confidence of our friends amongst the inhabitants. It will, however, I am persuaded, be your wish, as it is your duty, to guard the latter as much as possible from oppression.

The volunteers which were lately called out, will be retained as long as you consider their services necessary; the draughted militia, until further orders are received from the Secretary of War.

There can be little doubt of its being the intention of the enemy to send the greater part of the troops which they have at Burlington and York to Kingston, and to make York the right of their line. They may, however, have a small command at Burlington, and those may be so securely posted as to render them safe from any desultory expedition you may set on foot; but it is desirable to have any supplies which they may have collected in the neighborhood destroyed; and should the success below be not such as to promise possession of the whole of the upper province, may be destroyed.

Captains Leonard and Reed, or either of them, are appointed to muster your troops when and where you think proper.

In closing this communication, I should not do justice to my feelings, if I were not to acknowledge the zeal and talents with which you have managed your command. Your conduct appears to me to have been extremely judicious and proper throughout, and your troops exhibit a state of improvement and subordination which is at once honorable to your officers and themselves.

I am, very sincerely, your friend and obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. HARRISON.

Brig. Gen. GEORGE McCLURE.

FORT GEORGE, Nov. 10, 1813.

DEAR SIR: Major General Harrison embarked with his troops yesterday, on board the fleet destined for Sackett's Harbor, leaving the command once more in my hands. Owing to continued opposing winds, the fleet has not yet gotten out of sight.

A correspondence which took place between the General and myself, copies of which are herewith sent, will at once explain to you my views and feelings relative to the operations proposed to have been effected on this frontier. I am confident that the expressions of regret made by General Harrison are equally sincere with mine, though we both acquiesce in the necessity which dictated his abandonment of the projected expedition against Burlington.

About four hundred volunteers have repaired to this post under my late call, made in conformity with General Harrison's wishes and request. A few are still coming in. I shall take care that they shall not be unemployed. I am this moment sending out a detachment of two hundred mounted volunteers, with directions to penetrate the enemy's lines as far as practicable with safety. In the meantime, I am making preparations for moving in force against them, unless the intelligence expected from this excursion should be such as to make it improper.

Accounts of the enemy's force still vary much. A deserter came in to-day, who represents their force to be one thousand five hundred regulars, and eight hundred Indians, at Burlington and Stoney creek. The former I think is magnified.

It is impossible to form a correct opinion of their intended movements. At one time they appear to be sending down their stores and detachments of troops to York. At this time, it is said they are reinforcing, fortifying, and building barracks.

The term of service of my troops will expire on the 9th December. It can hardly be expected that many will willingly continue in service a longer time. Your Excellency will at once see the necessity of prompt arrangements being made to supply their place, if it be contemplated to retain this garrison.

I enclose herein my late address, made under the sanction of General Harrison.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's obedient humble servant.

GEORGE MCCLURE,
Brigadier General.

His Ex'cy J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

FORT GEORGE, November 15, 1813.

DEAR SIR: The subject of our conversation this morning has occupied my most serious reflections. The deadly blow heretofore given to the patriotism of our citizens on this frontier has prepared them for murmurs and complaints; those who are not on their march have left their homes and their business under great sacrifices, with the moral certainty of being brought into action.

The last address which I issued under your directions, and which, I am happy to find, has met your approbation, gives them reason for indulging the expectation of service, and they are anxious to drive the enemy from their borders forever. The high character of General Harrison, combined with these circumstances, has excited strong interest in the public mind relative to our operations.

In this peculiar situation of affairs, I feel it to be due to the gallant volunteers and militia, who are assembled and collecting, and to my own reputation, most respectfully to solicit, that, if it is not incompatible with your instructions and your better judgment, you will not abandon our projected expedition against Burlington heights; such is the anxious wish of the militia, and I have no doubt the soldiers under your command are equally, if not more, desirous of the employment.

My anxiety on the subject I trust will excuse the appearance of any disrespect, in making this communication, which is certainly far from my feelings. My confidence in the valor, ability, and prudence, of General Harrison, will dispose me most cheerfully to submit to any arrangements he may be bound to make, however great may be my disappointment in their result.

I have the honor to be, with the utmost respect, your obedient servant,

GEORGE MCCLURE.

Major General HARRISON.

HEADQUARTERS, NEWARK,
November 15, 1813.

DEAR SIR: Your letter to me of this morning has been received. I feel most severely the weight of the reasons which you urge for the prosecution of the intended expedition to Burlington. The disappointment, however, to the brave and patriotic men, who have turned out under the expectation of serving their country effectually in the field, at this inclement season, is the most painful circumstance attending it, as I am well convinced, from the information received this morning and last evening, that the enemy are removing as fast as possible from the head of the lake to Kingston, which has been left with a very small part of the force that was lately there; and it is more than probable that, should we advance in force, the enemy having now none but effective men at Burlington, would destroy the stores which they have remaining there, and retreat too rapidly to be overtaken. There are considerations, however, which would make it extremely desirable to make an expedition of force in that quarter, but the orders I have received from the Secretary of War leave me no alternative.

Commodore Chauncey is extremely pressing that the troops should immediately embark, declaring that the navigation, at this season, to small vessels, is very dangerous. The force at Sackett's Harbor is —. The troops at York are all hastening down to Kingston.

Sackett's Harbor may be endangered by even a delay of a few days; and should the troops that are here not get down before the lake is frozen, our fleet may be destroyed for the want of their aid. I cannot, therefore, take upon myself the responsibility of delaying their going down, even a day. Will you be so good, at a proper time, as to explain the above circumstances to the patriots who left their homes with the intention of assisting me to drive the enemy far from our borders, and assure them that I shall ever recollect, with the warmest gratitude, the partiality they have been pleased to express for me, and their preference of serving under my command.

I will direct payment to be made to the volunteers for rations and forage in coming out.

Accept my best wishes for your health and happiness, and believe me, sincerely, your friend,

WM. HENRY HARRISON.

General MCCLURE.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General McClure, to the Secretary of War, dated.

FORT GEORGE, Nov. 21, 1813.

"My mounted men have returned from the head of the lake, having progressed within sight of the enemy's pickets at Stoney creek. Colonel Wilcocks, who commanded, reports that, from the best information he could collect, the enemy's force consists of from twelve to fifteen hundred regulars, and nine hundred Indian warriors. They have discharged their teams, and, apparently, intend wintering there and at Burlington.

"It would be very desirable to dislodge them from their position, but I fear my force is insufficient for that object. At this inclement season it might be attended with serious consequences to attempt anything more than desultory excursions. The volunteers who have lately come in must, however, be actively employed, or they will return to their homes. The draughted militia on this side the Niagara are, perhaps, equal to any troops in the United States. I regret that their terms of service will expire so soon. Permit me to suggest the propriety of offering a small bounty to such of them as will volunteer to serve a longer time after their present term of service expires; say for one or two months, or until other troops can be sent on to supply their places.

"Should I move with my troops towards the head of the lake, the greatest advantage I can promise myself will be to destroy some contiguous mills, and to bring off a quantity of flour, which is becoming scarce with us."

ALBANY, November 25, 1813.

SIR: Your letter of the 17th instant has been received, and I hasten to inform you that a requisition for one thousand militia, to take the places of those now with you, has been made, and will be complied with as promptly as possible by the Governor.

You say nothing of the volunteer corps which General Porter engaged to raise, and which was long since authorized by me. If, in this effort, he has failed, what are you to expect from militia draughts, with their constitutional scruples? On the other hand, should he have succeeded, and should General Harrison's opinion of the intentions and movements of the enemy be well founded, your force will be competent to somewhat more than defence.

The General was not under orders to quit the Niagara frontier at any particular time. His movement, in this respect, was matter of arrangement with Commodore Chauncey, and this was necessarily subject to considerations arising from weather and season.

In the application of your present force, and in the means you take to enlarge and continue it throughout the Winter, you will be guided by the orders received from the commanding General, at the time he left you, and by such others as he may give to you hereafter.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOHN ARMSTRONG.
Brigadier General McCURE.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Parker, Chief Clerk of the War Department, to General McClure, dated WAR OFFICE, November 27, 1813.

"In the absence of the Secretary of War, I have had the honor to lay before the President your letters of the 19th and 21st instant, with their enclosures. The measures which you have adopted to increase your command on the Niagara frontier are approved by the President.

"Should the men, whose term of service expires in December, withdraw from the frontier, there can be no impropriety in continuing the officers who compose the court martial, until they discharge that duty.

"Although there is no law authorizing the President to give a bounty to such militia as will remain in service after their time expires, still, as it would render your force more efficient than a new draught, (even if the men could be obtained,) I have no hesitation in recommending that you adopt such further measures as will insure the protection of Fort George and the Niagara frontier, until other means of defence can be provided.

"For this purpose the Paymasters serving with your troops, may be required to make such payments or advances as you shall think proper to order."

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General McClure, (New York militia) to the Secretary of War, dated NIAGARA, December 10, 1813.

"This day found Fort George left to be defended by only sixty effective regular troops, under Captains Rodgers and Hampton, of the 24th regiment of United States' infantry, and probably forty volunteers. Within the last three days the term of service of the militia has been expiring, and they have re-crossed the river almost to a man. Foreseeing the defenceless situation in which the fort was left, I had authorized some of my most active subalterns to raise volunteer companies for two months, and offered a bounty, in addition to the month's pay. It is with regret I have to say that this expedient failed of producing the desired effect. A very inconsiderable number indeed were willing to engage for a further term of service, on any conditions.

"From the most indubitable information, I learn that the enemy are advancing in force. This day a scouting party of Colonel Wilcocks's volunteers came in contact with their advance at Twelve Mile creek, lost four prisoners and one killed; one of the former they gave up to the savages. This movement determined me in calling a council of the principal regular and militia officers left at Fort George this morning. They all accorded in opinion that the fort was not tenable with the remnant of force left in it. I, in consequence, gave orders for evacuating the fort since dusk, and, with but three boats, have brought over all the light artillery, and most of the arms, equipage, ammunition, &c., and shall doubtless have time to dispose of the heavy cannon before the enemy makes his appearance. The village of Newark is now in flames; the few remaining inhabitants in it, having been notified of our intention, were enabled to remove their property. The houses were, generally, vacant long before. This step has not been taken without counsel, and is in conformity with the views of your Excellency, disclosed to me in a former communication.

"The enemy are now completely shut out from any hopes or means of wintering in the vicinity of Fort George. It is truly mortifying to me that a part of the militia at least could not have been prevailed on to continue in service for a longer term; but the circumstance of their having to live in tents at this inclement season, added to that of the Paymaster's coming on only prepared to furnish them with one, out of three months' pay, has had all the bad effects that can be imagined. The best and most subordinate militia that have yet been on this frontier, finding that their wages were not ready for them, became, with some meritorious exceptions, a disaffected and ungovernable multitude.

"December 11.—I have this moment received a communication from the Governor of this State, covering a requisition on Major General Hall for one thousand men. It is probable that not more than six or seven hundred will rendezvous on this frontier, which will, in my humble opinion, be not more than competent to its proper protection, as some will have to be stationed at Black Rock, Schlosser, and Lewistown.

"I have written to General P. B. Porter, desiring him to employ the Indians for the protection of Buffalo, until the detachment arrives. Our shipping is in danger. No exertion will be wanting, within the pale of our limited means, to afford the protection contemplated."

Letter from the Secretary of War to Major Lee, of the 16th regiment of Infantry, Deputy Paymaster of the Army at Utica.

SHELDEN'S November, 4, 1813.

SIR: You will immediately take measures to pay off the brigade of McArthur (1,300 men) at Fort George, and the militia, volunteers, and Indians, under General McClure. Send an assistant, without loss of time, on this business. I am, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General George McClure to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, NIAGARA,
December 13, 1813.

"Since I last had the honor of writing you the enemy has appeared in considerable force on the opposite shore; but having deprived them of a shelter, they are marching up to Queenstown, and appear to be fortifying on the heights. Several hundred Indians have appeared. I have prevailed on Lieutenant Colonel Greaves, and about one hundred of his regiment of artillery, to remain in the service one month longer, until the detachment of militia which I have ordered arrives here. I have directed the Colonel, with two pieces of artillery, to Lewistown, to open a hot shot on Queenstown, and deprive them of quarters also. You will observe from my despatch of yesterday that every building in Newark is reduced to ashes. The enemy is much exasperated, and will make a descent on this frontier, if possible; but I shall watch them close with my handful of men, until a reinforcement of militia and volunteers arrive, when I shall endeavor to repossess myself of Fort George, and drive them back to Burlington. I am not a little apprehensive that the enemy will take advantage of the exposed situation of Buffalo, and our shipping there. My whole effective force on this extensive frontier, including the garrison at Fort Niagara, does not exceed two hundred and fifty men. I have sent an express to Mr. Granger, the Indian Agent, to call out the Indians; an exhibition of two or three hundred of them will strike more terror in the British than one thousand militia. Permit me to observe to you, sir, that it is all important that payment should be made punctually to the Indians every month, at the expiration of the term they may volunteer for. They are a people that cannot be made to understand the difficulty of having funds here at all times for that purpose. I beg leave to mention that Mr. Granger has interested himself warmly in support of the Government, by his endeavors to have the Indians join us on every occasion, and accompanied me himself on my late expedition to the twenty—.

"This day I start to Buffalo, which place I shall make my headquarters. I will reinforce this garrison as soon as possible. In the mean time, nothing shall be wanted on my part to promote the views of the Government, and protect the defenceless inhabitants of this frontier."

HEADQUARTERS, BUFFALO,
December 22, 1813.

SIR: I regret to be under the necessity of announcing to you the mortifying intelligence of the loss of Fort Niagara. On the morning of the 18th instant, about four o'clock, the enemy crossed the river at Five Mile Meadows, in great force, consisting of regulars and Indians, who made their way undiscovered to the garrison, which, from the most correct information I can collect, was completely surprised. Our men were nearly all asleep in their tents; the enemy rushed in and commenced a most horrible slaughter. Such as escaped the fury of the first onset, retired to the old messhouse, where they kept up a destructive fire on the enemy, until a want of ammunition compelled them to surrender.

Although our force was very inferior, and comparatively very small indeed, I am induced to think that the disaster is not attributable to any want of troops, but to gross neglect in the commanding officer of the fort, (Captain Leonard,) in not preparing, being ready, and looking out for the expected attack.

I have not been able to ascertain correctly the number of killed and wounded. About twenty regulars have escaped out of the fort—some badly wounded. Lieutenant Peck, 24th regiment, is killed, and it is said three others.

You will perceive, sir, by the enclosed general orders, that I apprehended an attack, and made the necessary arrangements to meet it, but have reason to believe, from information received by those who have made their escape, that the commandant did not in any way comply with those orders.

On the same morning a detachment of militia, under Major Bennet, stationed at Lewistown heights, was attacked by a party of savages; but the Major and his little corps, by making a desperate charge, effected their retreat, after being surrounded by several hundred, with the loss of six or eight, who doubtless were killed, among whom were two sons of Captain Jones, Indian interpreter. The villages of Youngstown, Lewistown, Manchester, and the Indian Tuscarora village, were reduced to ashes, and the inoffensive inhabitants who could not escape were, without regard to age or sex, inhumanly butchered by savages, headed by British officers painted. A British officer, who is taken prisoner, avows that many small children were murdered by the Indians. Major Mallory, who was stationed at Schlosser with about forty Canadian volunteers, advanced to Lewistown heights, and compelled the advanced guard of the enemy to fall back to the foot of the mountain. The Major is a meritorious officer. He fought the enemy two days, and contended every inch of ground to the Tanawantony creek. In these actions Lieutenant Lowe, 23d regiment United States' Army, and eight of the Canadian volunteers, were killed. I had myself, three days previous to the attack on Niagara, left it with a view of providing for the defence of this place, Black Rock, and the other villages on this frontier. I came here without troops, and have called out the militia of Genesee, Niagara, and Chateaugay counties, en masse.

This place was then thought to be in most imminent danger, as well as the shipping, but I have no doubt is now perfectly secure. Volunteers are coming in in great numbers. They are, however, a species of troops that cannot be expected to continue in service for a long time. In a few days 1,000 detached militia, lately draughted, will be on.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN WILSON,

Brigade Major.

Extract of a letter from General George McClure to the Secretary of War, dated BATAVIA, December 25, 1813.

"It is a notorious fact, that, on the night on which Fort Niagara was captured, Capt. Leonard was much intoxicated, and left the fort about 11 o'clock, P. M. I am assured that he has since given himself up; that he and family are now on the Canadian side of the strait. It was not without some reluctance that I left him in immediate command of the fort; but there was no alternative, as he outranked every other officer. His uniform attachment to British men and measures, added to the circumstance of his not effecting his escape when in his power, strengthens me in a suspicion that there was a secret understanding with regard to this disgraceful transaction.

"Permit me to suggest to you, sir, that, unless regular troops are sent to this frontier immediately, the enemy will penetrate into the interior of our country, and lay waste all before them. The militia will do to act with regulars, but not without them. In spite of all my exertions to insure subordination, my late detachment ultimately proved to be very little better than an infuriated mob. It was not, however, the fault of the privates, but of such officers as were seeking popularity, and who, on that account, were afraid of enforcing subordination, and introducing strict discipline.

"I have collected, from the different recruiting rendezvous, about one hundred and twenty soldiers, and put them under the command of Lieutenant Riddle, of the 15th United States' infantry, an excellent and deserving officer.

"I cannot conclude this communication without reporting the conduct of Doctor Cyrenius Chapin, (late Lieutenant Colonel of volunteers.) To him, in a great measure, ought all our disasters to be imputed. His publications in the Buffalo Gazette, that the enemy had abandoned Burlington, I fear had the desired effect. I have found him an unprincipled disorganizer. Since dismissing him and his marauding corps, he has been guilty of the most outrageous acts of mutiny, if not of treason. When I came to Buffalo, accompanied only by my suite, he headed a mob for the purpose of doing violence to my feelings and person; and when marching to the Rock, at the time of an alarm, five or six guns were discharged at me by his men."

Extracts of a letter from General Lewis Cass to the Secretary of War, dated Williamsville, eleven miles East of Buffalo, January 12, 1814.

"I passed this day the ruins of Buffalo. It exhibits a scene of distress and destruction such as I have never before witnessed.

"The events which have recently transpired in this quarter have been so astonishing and unexpected, that I have been induced to make some inquiry into their causes and progress; and doubting whether you have received any correct information upon the subject, I now trouble you with the detail.

"The fall of Niagara has been owing to the most criminal negligence. The force in it was fully competent to its defence. The commanding officer, Captain Leonard, it is confidently said, was at his own house, three miles from the fort, and all the officers appear to have rested in as much security as though no enemy was near them. Captain Rodgers and Captain Hampton, both of the 24th, had companies in the fort. Both of them were absent from it. Their conduct ought to be strictly investigated. I am also told that Major Wallace of the 5th was in the fort. He escaped, and is now at Erie.

"The circumstances attending the destruction of Buffalo you will have learned before this reaches you. But the force of the enemy has been greatly magnified. From the most careful examination, I am satisfied that not more than six hundred and fifty men, of regulars, militia, and Indians, landed at Black Rock. To oppose these, we had from two thousand five hundred to three thousand militia. All, except very few of them, behaved in the most cowardly manner. They fled without discharging a musket. The enemy continued on this side of the river till Saturday. All their movements betrayed symptoms of apprehension. A vast quantity of property was left in the town uninjured, and the Ariel, which lies four miles above upon the beach, is safe. Since the 1st instant they have made no movement. They continue in the possession of Niagara, and probably will retain it until a force competent to its reduction arrives in its vicinity."

Robert Lee, late of Lewistown, in the county of Niagara, and State of New York, gentleman, of the age of forty-two years, being sworn on the Holy Evangelists, depose and saith, that, some seven weeks immediately preceding the 19th of December last, he, this deponent, resided in Fort Niagara, for the purpose of attending to private business; that, about four o'clock in the morning of the 19th, the said fort was attacked or entered by the British. The garrison was not alarmed when the enemy entered the gates of the fort. Some firing took place after they entered the works, particularly between the guard at the Southeast block-house, and the sick in the hospital at the red barracks, on the part of the Americans, with the enemy. This deponent is positive that there were about four hundred men of all descriptions in the fort immediately before taken, and that three hundred and fifty of that number were capable and willing to bear arms in that way, viz: firing on the enemy from the block-houses, &c. The principal resistance the enemy met with was from the sick in the red barracks, and the guard at the Southeast block-house, beforementioned. The sick in the red barracks, as this deponent is informed, and from what he saw he believes, were nearly all slaughtered. The British force that took possession of the fort were in number about four hundred, commanded by Colonel Murray, who was wounded in the arm in entering the gate, and was succeeded in command by Colonel Hamilton. From the British order of congratulation, that issued on the same morning, it appeared that the Americans had lost sixty-five killed and fifteen wounded, which wounds were principally by the bayonet, as expressed in the order; but the above order issued very soon after they took possession of the fort, and did not include a number that were afterwards found bayoneted in the cellars of the houses. This deponent thinks that our loss in killed in the whole amounted at least to eighty. It was a matter of frequent conversation and exultation among the British non-commissioned officers and soldiers, while this deponent was under guard, that they bayoneted the Americans, notwithstanding their crying out for quarter. A subaltern officer and about twenty privates made their escape from the fort by scaling the pickets. Captain Leonard, the American commander, was, at the time the fort was taken, at his farm, about two miles distant, and, hearing the attack, made towards the fort, and at no great distance from it was made prisoner by the enemy, and was kept in close confinement for two days and a half, and how much longer this deponent does not know. The American soldiers were kept two days in close and miserable confinement, without the use of provisions, and with a very scanty supply of wood and water; at the expiration of which the citizens and soldiers were crossed over the river, and lodged in a part of what had been the British magazine at Fort George, the residue in open plank and board huts; in both situations it was impossible to lay down. The magazine was so filthy that many of the prisoners became infested with vermin, and in that situation remained seven days. The citizens were then removed to a brick building up near Queenstown, where they were so much crowded that no kind of comfort was to be taken either by day or night. The supply of provisions was not only scanty, but of the very worst kind; beef of the most inferior and repulsive quality, and bread, the quality of which cannot be described. The water that they used, both there and at the magazine, they had to purchase. This deponent believes that, through the influence of an individual in Upper Canada, himself, together with ten other American citizens, were permitted, on the 13th instant, to cross to the United States. The residue of the citizens, to the amount of about seventy, were marched, on the 12th, under a strong guard, to Burlington heights; and this deponent was informed that from thence they would be sent to Kingston. The women and children taken at and near Lewistown were stripped of their clothing, and taken across the river. And further this deponent saith not.

ROBERT LEE.

Brigadier General Alexander Smyth will proceed to Niagara and take the command of the brigade composed of the fifth, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and twentieth regiments of infantry, as they arrive at, or near, Niagara, and he will be respected and obeyed accordingly. On his arrival at Niagara, or in the vicinity of Major General Van Rensselaer's headquarters, he will report himself to that officer.

By order of Major General Dearborn.

Acting Deputy Adjutant General.

No. 2.

HEADQUARTERS, GREENBUSH,
October 4, 1812.

SIR: Your letter of the 27th, by Captain Dox, has been received. Before this reaches you, I trust the reinforcements will generally have arrived. I have made every effort in my power to have sufficient quantities of ammunition, clothing, medicine, arms, &c., forwarded, but not with all the success I could have wished. I shall continue to send on until I am satisfied there will be an ample supply. It rests with you to determine the proper time for acting offensively. You will, however, perceive the expediency of consulting the principal officers.

I am apprehensive that the enemy might attempt a stroke at the naval armament preparing at Sackett's Harbor, and it being of the first importance that no interruption should retard the progress of those operations, I doubt the expediency of withdrawing any part of the force from that place at present. When the troops destined for your post shall have arrived, your total force must exceed 7,000 men, which, I presume, will be sufficient for all contemplated purposes.

I confidently calculate on a co-operation by the way of Detroit, and on important aid from the naval department. It will be advisable to strike at Kingston from Sackett's Harbor, or its vicinity, or at least to attract the attention of the enemy in that direction, by such movement as will threaten a blow. If we should be so fortunate as to obtain the command of the lake, Kingston and the country about it may be taken possession of, and all the supplies in that direction may be cut off. You should have as many flat boats (and scows, if possible) as will be sufficient to transport 5,000 men, with field pieces and artillery horses, at once, with the aid of such other vessels as can be readily procured.

The contractor should be reminded of the necessity of having a sufficient stock of provisions on hand for two months, exclusive of the current issues.

It will be proper that a correspondence be kept up by expresses, between you and General Harrison, which will enable you to ascertain his movements; but if we should be fortunate enough to command Lake Ontario, we ought to possess ourselves of that part of Canada bordering on the lake, including the vicinity of Niagara, whether Harrison succeeds or not.

I enclose to you a copy of General Amherst's order at Fort Edward, on the 12th of July, 1759. The authority must be respected by every British officer. It will be expedient for you to have such an order published, with such alterations only as the change in circumstances, in a national view, has rendered necessary; and it might be well to quote the authority referred to.

I have considered it fortunate to find such an order from so respectable a source. It is contained in the "Historical Journal of the Campaigns in North America, in the years 1757, '58, '59, and '60, by Captain John Knox," published in England in 1769.

With high consideration, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

Major General VAN RENSSELAER.

P. S. I am just informed that General Harrison will be at Detroit by the 15th of this month at the farthest. Forts Harrison and Wayne have been relieved, and the Indians dispersed.

Inspector's Report of the Twelfth Regiment of Infantry commanded by Colonel Thomas Parker.

Officers, non-commissioned Officers, and Privates.—The character of Colonel Parker is too well known at the War Office to require comment. Major Campbell will doubtless make a most valuable officer. The company officers are yet very ignorant of their duty; but they generally appear to be very intelligent young men, and gentlemen. The non-commissioned officers and privates are, with scarcely an exception, excellent recruits.

Arms, Accoutrements, and Ammunition.—The muskets are good, but some few of them out of repair. No gun slings have been furnished; neither has there been a sufficiency of screw-drivers, worms, picks, or brushes, supplied. The knapsacks are very bad, as are likewise the canteens. The regiment has only about twenty-three rounds of ball cartridge, and not two flints per man; and there is no ammunition in store at this place. The cartridges are many of them very bad.

Manner in which the War has been conducted.

Clothing and Pay.—Though the month of October is partly gone, yet, strange to tell, this regiment has not received a single article of woollen clothing. All the men are without coats, and have been obliged to mount guard, during the cold and stormy weather which we have had for a week past, in their linen jackets and overalls. Unless immediate steps are taken to furnish proper clothing, the men must all fall victims to the neglect. Paid up to the 31st of August.

Camp Equipage, Stationery Hospital Stores, &c.—The tents are very bad. Camp kettles and tin pans, good and complete. Axes and spades, bad and incomplete. No stationery.

The Surgeon complains that he is without medicine, hospital stores, or surgical instruments.

Provisions.—Colonel Parker states that he receives good provisions for his regiment.

Discipline.—Captains Sangster's and Page's companies are very raw, and ignorant of their duty. Taking into consideration that the men are recruits, and have just come off a long and fatiguing march, the state of Captain Morgan's company does him honor, but its discipline is still very imperfect.

Inspector's Report on the state of the Fourteenth Regiment of Infantry, commanded by Colonel William H. Winder.

Officers, non-commissioned Officers, and Privates.—The Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel appear to have taken great pains to acquire a knowledge of the duties of their stations. The company officers are almost as ignorant of their duty as when they entered service. The non-commissioned officers and privates are generally only tolerably good recruits.

Arms, Accoutrements, and Ammunition.—The arms of this regiment are in infamously bad order. They appear to be old muskets that have probably been bought up at reduced prices by the contractors or other public agents, and are now placed in the hands of men who are almost within gunshot of the enemy. The Inspector has no hesitation in giving it as his opinion, that at least one-fifth of them are unfit for service; and he believes, were they to undergo a critical inspection, a much larger proportion of them would be condemned. The cartridge boxes, bayonet scabbards, and belts, are good; the knapsacks are very bad. Neither gun slings, picks, nor brushes, have been furnished; nor has a sufficient number of screw-drivers and worms been supplied. This regiment has a large supply of ball cartridges, powder, and lead, but a considerable proportion of it is very bad; some of the cartridges are said to have been made up in 1794. There is a scarcity of flints.

Camp Equipage, Hospital Stores, &c.—The tents never were good; and have been so much abused on the march to this place, that they afford little protection from the weather. Camp kettles and tin pans, good and complete; axes and spades, very bad. No supply of stationery. The surgeon states he is without medicine, hospital stores, and surgical instruments.

Clothing and Pay.—Though the month of October is partly gone, yet, strange to tell, this regiment has not received a single article of woollen clothing. All the men are without coats, and many without shoes or stockings; and have been obliged to mount guard, during the cold and stormy weather which we have had for a week past, barefooted, and in their linen jackets and overalls. Unless immediate steps are taken to supply proper clothing, the men must all fall victims to the neglect. Paid up to the 31st of July.

Provisions.—The Lieutenant Colonel states that the regiment is supplied with very bad provisions.

Discipline.—The regiment is composed entirely of recruits; they appear to be almost as ignorant of their duty as if they had never seen a camp, and scarcely know on which shoulder to carry the musket. They are mere militia, and, if possible, even worse; and if taken into action in their present state, will prove more dangerous to themselves than to their enemy.

I will thank you to give an order on the Quartermaster for eighty blankets, and thread to make watch coats for my regiment. Indeed, if in your opinion it could be justified, I could wish that every man could be furnished with one. Those I now ask for are intended for the use of the guards.

With the highest regard and respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

No. 9.

Brigadier General Smyth to the Secretary of War.

NEAR BUFFALO, October 20, 1812.

SIR: On the 16th instant, General Van Rensselaer, by a general order, invested me with the command of the troops between the Lakes Erie and Ontario, with power to order general courts martial, and exercise the authority of commander of a great military district.

On the 18th instant, I ordered Colonel Winder

(an admirable officer) to Fort Niagara; on the 19th I broke up the camp at Lewistown, ordered the militia, such as had not deserted, and excepting the artillery, to Schlosser; the artillery were put under Colonel Winder's command, and would most of them take post on the mountain opposite Queenstown. Colonel Parker, with the detachments of the 12th and 20th, will take post on a small creek near Black Rock, and collect the boats. Colonel Schuyler, with the detachments of the 5th and 13th, will take a position near him. The volunteers will encamp near Buffalo.

In the small creek I mention, I wish to have one hundred boats that will carry across at once four thousand men, and twenty or thirty scows or flats, to take over artillery or cavalry. And if you will increase my force to eight thousand men, with twenty pieces of light and field artillery, and some troops of cavalry, I will enter Canada, and leave the rest to Heaven.

Place no confidence in detached militia. They have disgraced the nation. Do not rely on the contractor for provisions. He has no salt meat, and only damaged flour. If you have any compassion on the service, send money either to Lieutenant Allison, my brigade quartermaster, or to some public agent under my orders. Without it we cannot supply the contractor's deficiencies; we cannot get transportation by land, build boats, procure forage, or anything else, wanted by the army.

Give me here a clear stage, men, and money, and I will retrieve your affairs or perish.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

ALEXANDER SMYTH.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Nov. 4, 1812.

SIR: Your letter of October 20th has been received. On the 21st of October Major General Dearborn reported to this Department that he had granted General Van Rensselaer's request to retire from his command; that he had directed him to give over his command to you; and that he had written you "in a particular and explicit manner." You are too well acquainted with service to require to be informed that all communications respecting your command should be directed to that officer. A copy of your letter has been enclosed to General Dearborn.

Such ordnance as he may assign to Niagara must be sent from Albany. Transportation, whether by boats or wagons, is furnished by the Quartermaster's department; and in case of failure or deficiency in rations, purchases should be made according to the provisions of the contract, for which purpose bills may be drawn on this Department, properly advised, that the contractor may be made accountable.

Colonel Parker's Report to Brigadier General Smyth.

Colonel Parker has the honor to report to General Smyth that, agreeably to his orders, he has caused to be collected all the boats that could be found last evening, and had them carried up the creek to an old field about a mile above the bridge, where they are left under a small guard.

He has also obtained a promise from Lieutenant Angus, of the Navy, to send out a party of sailors to collect all the boats he can find on the coast, and convey them to the same place.

Colonel Parker would beg leave to suggest to the General, the propriety of placing these boats under the charge of a careful officer; and, as many of them are leaky and scarce of oars, have them carefully prepared for service.

From report, Colonel Parker is of opinion that the Secretary of War will probably urge a descent on Canada this Fall; but he supposes that a discretionary power will certainly be given to the commanding officer on the lines. From the present state of the Quartermaster's and Commissary's departments; from the almost total want of discipline in the regular troops; and from the little confidence that can be placed in the militia force; it would appear that a successful issue could hardly be expected, and defeat might prove highly injurious to our country. If the General's attention should be entirely turned to the discipline of the troops, even to the 10th of next month, it is feared that, after that period, it would be too late to put the troops under a comfortable cover before the Winter sets in, which might be attended with the most fatal consequences. Would it not, therefore, be better to detail six or eight men, best qualified for the service, from each company, to commence the building the huts while the residue are employed on drill?

While Colonel Parker has taken the liberty of making the foregoing observations, he begs leave to assure the General of his entire submission to his better judgment, and of his determination to promote his views by every exertion that his feeble health and abilities will permit.

No. 12.

Major General Dearborn to Brigadier General Smyth.

HEADQUARTERS, GREENBUSH,

October 21, 1812.

SIR: Major General Van Rensselaer having communicated a wish to retire from his command, I have acquiesced in his request, and have desired him to give over the command which he held to you, and to give you copies of my last two or three letters to him, and such information in relation to the enemy, his means of obtaining information, and the state of the troops, stores, &c., as he may possess. The unfortunate affair at Queenstown, on the 13th, is most seriously to be lamented; but we must endeavor, by redoubled efforts, to retrieve the state of our affairs. I have ordered Colonel Porter, of the artillery, to Niagara, to take command of the whole of the light and heavy artillery at that post. You will find in him all the requisite practical information and industry in his line. A fine company of light artillery, all mounted, will proceed as rapidly as possible to replace such as have been lost. On their arrival, it will, I presume, be expedient to send the greatest number of horses back to some place where forage may be conveniently obtained. I shall order Colonel McClure, with his battalion of uniform volunteers, to march from Onondaga to Niagara; and I yet hope that, when the troops shall have been concentrated, and put into a state of organization, that you will be able to pass into Canada, and secure good Winter quarters. I had directed General Van Rensselaer to call on the contractor for a deposit of provisions for at least two months, exclusive of the current issues. It will be expedient for you to repeat the requisition on the contractor. Captain Thomas, the Deputy Quartermaster General, will join you with stores and funds for that department; and I trust you will find in him an active and attentive officer. It will be proper to give Colonel Parker the command of a brigade. In all important movements you will, I presume, consider it advisable to consult some of your principal officers. Every means in your power should be exerted to procure a sufficient number of boats and scows for transporting the troops. You should, if possible, be prepared for crossing with three thousand men, with artillery, at once. Faithful and experienced boatmen should be selected for managing the whole of the boats, and there should be a surplus in each boat as a provision to meet accidents. The greatest precaution should be observed in the arrangement for embarkation and debarkation. You will pardon me for being thus particular. The most important consideration will be that of ascertaining and agreeing on the best and surest points for crossing; much will depend on a judicious selection of the principal landing places. Your information will enable you, with the advice of your principal officers, to decide on these subjects in the most judicious manner. That you may be so fortunate as to succeed in retrieving and meliorating the state of our affairs, is my most ardent wish. You will, by all practicable means, endeavor to correspond with General Harrison, who, I presume, is now at Detroit, with a very respectable force. I need not impress you with the necessity of cultivating a spirit of harmony and good understanding among all the corps under your command; on which the success of your operations will materially depend. I have been establishing a line of expresses between this place and Niagara, by which despatches may pass in about forty-four hours. You will direct where the non-commissioned officers of the express will be stationed near your quarters. The line will, I trust, be completed within two or three days after this reaches you.

With esteem and consideration, your obedient and humble servant,

H. DEARBORN.

No. 13.

Brigadier General Alexander Smyth to Major General Dearborn.

CAMP NEAR BUFFALO, Oct. 24, 1812.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 21st instant, and shall fail in nothing in my power to retrieve the state of our affairs.

The affair of Queenstown probably diminished our force 2,000 men; one-half of which were killed, wounded, and prisoners, and the other half deserted, or were discharged in consequence of some battalions being greatly reduced.

General Van Rensselaer transferred to me the command on the 15th, and on the 16th I broke up the camp at Lewistown; sent the 14th infantry, under Colonel Winder, to Niagara; the militia artillery to a battery opposite the heights of Queenstown; the militia infantry and riflemen to Schlosser; and I returned with the 5th, 13th, 12th, and 20th, to my camp near Buffalo; the troops of the light and 2d artillery are at Black Rock.

In a creek at Black Rock I am collecting boats; and there I propose to cross. The Canadian shore is easy of access from Erie to Chippewa. There are some batteries opposite Black Rock that I can have carried when I please.

Boats are wanting. I have sent to have those which Chrystie brought to Niagara carried to Schlosser; this will be a difficult work. Scows are wanting and essential. As yet I have no funds.

The reinforcement you mention I hope will encourage those under my command. It is said 500 soldiers have arrived at Fort George since the battle; that the Indians have gone home to gather their corn; and that three-fourths of the militia are called into service. As the enemy's regular troops and flankers amount to 3,000 men, their militia, if called out, as said, may swell their force to 10,000 men.

It has seemed to me, sir, that the three armies should strike on the same day. If not, the command of the Lakes will enable the enemy to beat us in detail.

The sailors here will furnish me with excellent boatmen. I shall take the opinions of a few of my most enlightened officers at times, but I will decide.

There is some difficulty in giving Colonel Parker a brigade, as Schuyler contests his right to rank. Winder is an officer of the first class.

In consequence of the loss of five companies of the 13th, I consolidated the 5th and 13th, as was done by the Adjutant General in the case of the 12th and 20th. In consequence, Milton asked and obtained a furlough. His regiment was badly governed, and I found I had nothing to expect from him.

I do not expect the contractor to supply us with provisions. I received a number of returns at Lewistown, "unfit for duty for want of provisions."

We much want some cannon of large calibre for the fort of Niagara, and the batteries of Black Rock. A powerful battery at the latter place would protect our landing at noon day.

The ship carpenters have gone off, which I much regret.

Colonel Porter will doubtless be of great service to us; but I should have preferred his coming to Black Rock.

I shall keep you advised of our progress.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect and esteem, your most obedient,

ALEXANDER SMYTH,
Brigadier General.

A hospital will be immediately established at Buffalo. Houses shall be rented, and Doctor Hays will take charge of, and regulate it.

To that hospital the sick and wounded in camp and its vicinity will be removed. Doctor Hays will make requisitions for such articles as are necessary for their comfort, and matrons and nurses will be employed.

By order: H. SMYTH,

Major General Dearborn to Brigadier General Smyth.
HEADQUARTERS, GREENBUSH,
October, 28, 1812.

SIR: Your letters of the 22d and 24th were received at 5 o'clock P. M. yesterday. This will leave here to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock. I have this day received information from General Bloomfield that about 800 men, with several field pieces, left Montreal for your neighborhood on the 14th instant; of course the sooner you are prepared to strike the better. From the accounts I have received from Fort George, I am induced to believe that, exclusive of Fort Erie and its immediate dependencies, the whole force on the British side of the river does not amount to more than twelve or fourteen hundred, including the militia which were in service at the time of the unfortunate partial attack; and the derangement the death of General Brock must have occasioned in relation to the militia and Indians must have a considerable effect on their measures of defence, if they are not allowed too long a time for procuring reinforcements, and forming a new organization. I expect that General Bloomfield will move immediately towards Montreal, and I calculate on his being able to beat up the several posts between his camp and the river St. Lawrence. You should be explicit and positive in your orders to the contractor for having at least two months' deposit of provisions on hand, exclusive of the current issues. If you should determine on crossing from the vicinity of Black Rock with your main force, will not the enemy have it in his power to destroy the bridge over Chippewa creek, and render your passage difficult? You will, I presume, think it advisable to make one or more feints at other points, while your main body crosses at the place decided on.

Manner in which the War has been conducted.

I am induced to suspect that the actual benefit of heavy ordnance, in facilitating a landing, has been overrated. Some twelve pounders in scows would, in my opinion, be of more service in covering a landing than the fire of heavy pieces at long shots. And when a footing is secured on the Canada shore, the ordnance in their batteries must undoubtedly fall into your hands. Neither General Van Rensselaer nor yourself have said anything in relation to the arrival of the Pennsylvania militia. I presume they must have arrived, or that you will have sent in quest of them, with orders to hurry on as quick as possible. An additional supply of powder, balls, paper, &c., has been ordered to your post. Colonel Porter left this place on the 24th with 100 light artillerists, all mounted, and well appointed in every respect. He will proceed in the stage to Canandaigua, and from thence to your quarters as rapidly as possible. You will perceive the propriety and necessity of a return being made of all the troops under your command, which has been too long delayed.

With esteem and consideration, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

Brigadier General SMYTH.

Extract of a letter from James Selden, Jr., of Troy, to General Smyth, dated

NOVEMBER 27, 1812.

"I am informed, from an undoubted source, that the British have received a reinforcement of 800 regulars at Fort George; that is, they are not exactly at Fort George, but have encamped about one and a half miles up Chippewa creek, where the enemy have been building barracks. A cousin of mine brought me this information, who was in the British militia service, and deserted."

The new barracks erected in the vicinity of Fort George and Chippewa have, from the precipitancy of the enemy's flight, escaped being burnt.

Colonel Thomas Parker to General Smyth.

CAMP, Oct. 30, 1812.

SIR: You did me the honor last evening to consult me about the propriety of forming a brigade, to be composed of the regular troops expected in camp, and some of the volunteers and militia now on the lines.

I have been made acquainted, from different sources, with the disposition of the troops at Buffalo and Colonel Swift's regiment, and I think there is only one company amongst them that would not corrupt any regular troops that they might be associated with. And even that company would not be willing to be subjected to regular discipline. What may be the disposition of the volunteer Irish Greens I do not know; but, upon the whole, I should think it best to keep the regulars entirely distinct from them.

I would beg leave to recommend that the militia and volunteers be formed into a distinct brigade, and put under strict drill. If they will not bear this, they had better be at home.

I must beg leave, sir, to call your attention to the requisition made for flannel, as it will be of infinite service to our men.

I have the honor to be, with much respect and esteem, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS PARKER,
Colonel 12th Infantry.

No. 19.

Brigadier General Alexander Smyth to Major General Dearborn.

CAMP, NEAR BUFFALO, Oct. 30, 1812.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive, to day, at four o'clock P. M., your letter of the 28th inst.

We may, in a few days, have together seventy boats, that would carry over three thousand five hundred men; but we have no scows. I have set all the carpenters, and some citizens, to building of scows. We want tools and materials. The Deputy Quartermaster gives it as his opinion that we can have ten scows in twenty days.

I would cross in three days, if I had the means; without them, it would be injustice to the nation and myself to attempt it. I must not be defeated.

The New York Greens, and a troop of volunteer cavalry have arrived. The twenty-third regiment, the Pennsylvania volunteers, and those from Baltimore, have not arrived.

The Deputy Quartermaster has brought on checks instead of money; and he is unable to make payments. His letter to the Quartermaster General is enclosed; and I request that money may be sent to him immediately.

If I can beat the enemy on the plains of Erie, and take that place, I will find means to get to Fort George, whatever may become of the bridge of Chippewa.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER SMYTH,
Brigadier General.

Colonel William H. Winder to Brigadier General Smyth.

FORT NIAGARA, Oct. 30, 1812.

SIR: Captain Archer, of the 2d artillery, arrived

Manner in which the War has been conducted.

at this post this morning; he has with him about sixty men and two six pounders. His instructions were to report himself to Lieutenant Colonel Scott, at this place.

Under the circumstances, I have deemed it advisable to recommend his waiting your orders here; which he will do. I send this by an express.

In a letter, which I addressed you by Mr. Suchet, I suggested the propriety of retaining ten or twelve boats on this end of the line; a knowledge of your wishes on this subject might prevent the labor and trouble of bringing them back from Schlosser.

The movement of troops and boats from this end of the line has occasioned a considerable movement of men, from the other side of the river, towards Erie. They have been principally, if not altogether, militia. The number expected, by the cavalry stationed between this and Lewis, as passing up, are from four to five hundred.

This morning the armed ship Earl Moira has arrived, accompanied by a small unarmed schooner, having a number of men on her deck; but how many there are cannot yet be ascertained, as they have not landed.

I shall gather all the force I can, and parade them near here to-morrow; my object will be to prevent the accumulation of force against your end of the line, by making a display here; should your movements render it necessary, I can send them on to that end of the line by a fleet.

Should not Captain Archer be necessary to you he will be of important service here.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. H. WINDER,
Colonel Commanding.

No. 21.

Colonel William H. Winder to Brigadier General Alexander Smyth.

FORT NIAGARA, November 3, 1812.

SIR: I avail myself of the opportunity, by Lieutenant Totten, of the Engineers, to write you. You will find him a useful and valuable officer in his professional line, and an estimable private man.

I shall send the clothing for the fifth, which is one barrel only, and a quantity of stockings, by Quartermaster Allison. I also enclose you a return of clothing at this place, made to me by Captain Leonard. This list is exclusive of twenty-three tierces, sent on to the fourteenth, which contain coats, pantaloons, and vests, only of winter clothing.

Another vessel arrived at Fort George yesterday evening. It was near dark, and no accurate observations could be made from here. Captain Archer was at the Salt battery, directly opposite Fort George, and will be able to inform you more particularly; I have not seen him. It is said that a body of Indians landed from her, say one hundred. Every one of their brethren that we can raise should cross to meet them. I suspect the enemy relies very much upon his savage ally. As many militia riflemen as can in any sort be relied on, and can be got to cross, would be important.

Should your plans permit a notice of twenty-four hours to be given to me before I move from here, I might make some movements to draw them toward this end of the line. By selecting the twilight, of morning or evening, I might give my force the appearance of a thousand men, and make some indications of crossing.

My whole force is applied to the requisite labor of the garrison and batteries. I shall turn to drilling at every movement.

I am, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

WM. H. WINDER, Colonel.

No. 22.

Lieutenant Colonel Livingston to General Alexander Smyth.

BUFFALO, Nov. 4, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to report the result of my inspection, as far as was in my power, of General Miller's brigade of militia, and the organization of the same, as contemplated by your order of the 29th ultimo. I regret I am not enabled to make a favorable report, but the state of the brigade is such as to be little better than an undisciplined rabble, and it may be a question whether they are not of more disservice than of use; the total want of order no doubt proceeds from the ignorance of the officers, and the great familiarity that exists between them and their men; that this can be remedied, perhaps is impossible, while such materials are employed for officers. I have endeavored to select and retain in service the best, and such as I am told will not shrink from duty.

After waiting two days for the different returns, I found it impossible to obtain them, although I applied to the General and his Brigade Major, whose duty I presume it was to furnish them. This circumstance prevents my giving a statement of the exact number of men, arms, ammunition, &c. The arms in use are good, although not kept (with a few exceptions) in such order as they ought to be. I am informed there are about seven hundred and fifty men, of which four hundred and twenty were under arms on the day of inspection. On Saturday evening one hundred deserted, and no measures taken to bring them back; a spirit of mutiny seems to pervade the camp.

I shall leave this to-morrow for Geneva, and will take charge of any communication for his Excellency the Governor, or any other you may wish to forward.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
J. W. LIVINGSTON.

CAMP, NEAR THE NAVY YARD,

SIR: If Captain Thomas intends that the boats and scows should be built in any reasonable time, he ought to furnish a sufficient quantity of tools for the men under my command to work with; at present, more than one-half of them have not proper tools to work; narrow axes are much wanted; the augers, chisels, saws, &c., were all to be put in order, and will be of little use for some days. I have selected three men to build a scow, agreeably to my own directions, and to see what time it takes to make one.

I am, sir, with respect,

HEADQUARTERS, GREENBUSH,
November 8, 1812.

SIR: Your letter of the 30th was duly received. I have sent an additional supply of cartridges and stockings. I trust the Pennsylvania militia have joined you. I have sent Colonel Macomb, with upwards of four hundred men, to co-operate with Commodore Chauncey, who has informed me that he shall be ready on the 15th instant to look for and attack the British force on Lake Ontario, and probably attack Kingston, if I should send him a body of troops that he could rely on to aid him. If he should succeed, I have requested him to send a part of his force to Niagara as soon as practicable. I hope you will be ready to strike as soon as he will. A movement will probably be made by that time towards Montreal; and, at the same time, I trust General Harrison will be in operation at Detroit. The campaign may still be closed with success. I shall set off this day for Lake Champlain. If you succeed at Niagara, York and Kingston will demand your early attention. That you may succeed, and cover yourself and the troops under your command with glory, is the ardent wish of your friend and humble servant,

H. DEARBORN.

Brigadier General SMYTH.

No. 25.

Brigadier General Smyth to Major General Dearborn.

CAMP NEAR BUFFALO, Nov. 9, 1812.

SIR: Colonel McFeely arrived on the 1st inst. with about one hundred and eighty men of the 22d. Captain Archer's company of artillery arrived on the 4th instant; and to-day Col. Brown, with one hundred and ninety infantry; and also the light artillery arrived.

I have sent an officer to meet the Pennsylvanians. He had gone as far as Erie, when I last heard of him, without meeting them. They are volunteers to supply that State's quota of militia. Can they be forced to cross the line? I am told they will refuse.

One of the Aids of the Governor of New York has been at Schlosser in the capacity of Deputy Adjutant General, making a new organization of the militia there. I caused them to encamp by themselves—not a soldier within ten miles of them. One hundred of them deserted the next night after the Governor's Aid left them.

What most disturbs me is the ill health of the troops. The measles has affected many; and the want of salt meat, of ovens, and exposure to cold—until lately without winter clothing—have produced dysentery and other diseases. Our hospitals are filled with sick and wounded, and new cases of diseases are occurring daily.

Colonel Winder, with the 14th, is coming to this place from Niagara. I shall trust the defence of it to two companies of artillery, and Lieutenant Colonel McFeely's corps of infantry, which will march to-morrow.

The contractors have failed to supply, and I have ordered purchases of provisions for Fort Niagara.

Between the 20th and 30th instant I shall be ready to cross the river with about thirteen hundred regular infantry, three hundred artillery, six hundred volunteers, and seventy cavalry—if you will allow me Captain Morgan's troop. In this estimate is not included the Pennsylvania and New York militia.

Two regiments will proceed, on to-morrow, to commence building huts. If we cannot stay on the other side, we shall have a shelter ready for the sick and wounded.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest esteem, your most obedient,

ALEX'R SMYTH, Brig. Gen.

Major General DEARBORN.

P. S.—A District Paymaster, with money, is necessary. The volunteers cannot be retained in service unless paid. Lieutenant Gansevoort, of the artillery, who states that he was appointed District Paymaster, was ordered to Albany more than three weeks since to procure funds. I have heard that he is sick. Colonel Brown's regiment mutinied at Manlius on account of their pay.

No. 26.

General Smyth conceives the following facts should be known and considered by the Secretary of War:

1. That the 5th regiment, at Utica, on its march, did mutiny for want of their pay.
2. That the 23d regiment, at Manlius, did mutiny on account of their pay, which is still due.
3. That a company of volunteers, at Buffalo, did mutiny on account of their pay and clothing.*
4. That the Captain of another volunteer company, the best in service, has stated that he believes his men will not cross into Canada without their pay and allowance for clothing.†

* Phillips's.

† Allison's.

Manner in which the War has been conducted.

5. That the Deputy Quartermaster states himself to be without money.

6. That there is no District Paymaster at Niagara supplied with money.

7. That Colonel Winder, commanding at Fort Niagara, reports, "We are literally starving on this end of the line for bread." In consequence of which the Deputy Quartermaster has been ordered to purchase provisions.

8. That eighteen hundred Pennsylvania volunteers will arrive next week.

9. That General Smyth will be ready in fifteen days to cross into Canada.

Speech to Indians.

BROTHERS: I thank you for the tender of your services in the defence of the United States, which you have made, and in their name accept them, in case the troops and the Indians of the British King should invade the United States; which I expect they will not dare to attempt.

It is the desire of your Great Father, the President, that you should take no part in the war between the United States and Great Britain, but remain at peace, and take care of your wives and children.

The British nation is not able to maintain the contest against the United States on this great island, without help. They ask the Indians for help, who have given it, and will be ruined by doing so. We are able to beat the British without help. And, although we understand that you are willing to help us if we ask it, yet we do not ask it. The quarrel is ours, and not yours; and we will fight our own battles.

Brothers: Hold fast the chain of friendship between you and the United States, who are great, powerful, just, and good, and will vanquish all their enemies, and protect all their friends.

across the river will take place. I am informed that a quantity of great coats came up from Niagara, and I believe they will never be better disposed of than by distributing them to the soldiers now. The enclosed return, handed you by the Quartermaster of the 14th, will supply my regiment, with what I have already had made. I pray you, therefore, if you deem it not absolutely inadmissible, to order the issue agreeably to the return.

Should you not feel at liberty to order the pea-coats to be issued, we must be satisfied with blankets, and do the best we can under existing circumstances; at all events, as many great coats as are necessary for guard duty may issue as a matter of course. I have drawn returns for either alternative, which the Quartermaster will present you.

Paymaster Merchant to Brigadier General Smith.

ALBANY, November 23, 1812.

SIR: Yesterday I received your letter of the 10th instant, I am not now, but daily expect to be, in possession of funds. I have written, about a week since, to Mr. Brent, the Paymaster at Washington, for funds. Since the reception of your letter, I have written again, stating the condition of the volunteers, and also recommending that paymasters be appointed to those regiments that are without them, and that a proportionate number of assistant paymasters be appointed. By this means the regiments and detachments can be regularly paid. I do not know which of the regiments along the frontiers have paymasters. To those regiments that have not, they will, without doubt, be appointed, provided proper persons are selected and named to the Paymaster at Washington, by the Colonels of the respective regiments. In a letter to Lieutenant Gansevoort, Assistant Paymaster, I requested him to notify to the regimental paymasters, to transmit me estimates of such sums as would be wanted to pay off their respective regiments, and that he would himself make an estimate of money that would be required to pay those regiments and detachments that are without paymasters. I trust, sir, that some speedy and efficient provision will be made for the regular payment of the troops along the frontiers.

I am, sir, with sentiments of respect, your obedient servant,

GEORGE MERCHANT,
District Paymaster, U. S. Army.

Brigadier General A. SMYTH.

BANKS OF NIAGARA, 8 O'CLOCK AT NIGHT,
November 25, 1812.

Colonel Winder will pass over to the Canada shore, with the troops who are marched from camp this evening, and superintend the attack of the enemy's batteries and parties, distributing his force in the following manner:

Lieutenant Colonel Boerstler, with the detachment of the 14th regiment, will attack the guard at the bridge opposite the upper point of Stanberry island. Lieutenant Colonel Coles, with the companies of Captain Sangster, Taylor, Myers, and the company, late Branch's, will take the party at the Red House. Major Campbell, with the companies of Captains Buckner, Morgan, Stannard, and Page, will attack the guard house, opposite the lower point of Squaw island. Captain King, and Lieutenant Angus, of the navy, (who is so good as to offer his services, and those of the seamen under his command,) will, with the companies of Captains Wool, Sproul, and Martin, attack the batteries opposite to Black Rock. Captain Bankhead, with the companies of Captains Brooks, Whartenby, Chambers, and Dorman, will attack the enemy's batteries opposite to Fort Gibson.

The parties will support each other, as circumstances may require, and as Colonel Winder may order.

The enemy's guns are to be spiked and dismounted; the bridge rendered impassable, all boats brought off, and as many prisoners as possible taken.

Colonel Winder will bring off his detachment from the Canada shore by daylight to-morrow.

Brigadier General Commanding.

SIR: The indisposition of the officers to cross is such, and the real difficulties, for want of a little preparatory arrangement, that I fear the issue will be disgraceful and fatal. I would venture to recommend a delay of the expedition.

Major Campbell, field officer of the day, to Brigadier General Alexander Smyth.

CAMP, NIGH BUFFALO, NEW YORK,
November 27, 1812.

Major Campbell, field officer of the day, reports to Brigadier General Alexander Smyth, commanding the United States' army of the centre, that he has received no guard report from Captain Mills, commanding the guard.

Although it may not be strictly within the province of the officer of the day, yet he has been so forcibly struck with the melancholy and desponding state of the troops, that he feels it a duty which he owes to the friendship of the commanding General to make to him the following statement:

He has received from several Captains reports or statements of the present state of their companies.

Captain Stannard states that when he marched to

Lewistown, he had	-	-	-	-	92

Leaving a company of fifty strong. He further states, that many who are not reported sick, are unfit for duty, and that he is sure he will not be able to bring into the field more than thirty men.

Captain Taylor reports that he had ninety-five men. They were the best looking men in the regiment, except Morgan's

Five of whom are waiters, and two of the five are sick, leaving thirty-four men.

Lieutenant Payton states that when they arrived at the present encampment, Captain Branch had eighty-seven able bodied effective men; now they have only thirty-eight, and six waiters, making forty-four. Forty-three, therefore, are either sick or dead.

Captain Morgan arrived here with ninety-nine healthy, strong men, well calculated for fatigue.

Leaving sixty-seven for duty. But such is the situation of those reported for duty, that he does not calculate on marching more than fifty men.

Captain Sangster's company is the most healthy. He will probably march seventy or eighty men. Captain Page about thirty. Our regiment will, then, when in the field, be about two hundred and sixty-four strong. From the information of the Surgeon, I am well persuaded none of those reported sick will be able to march.

The Surgeon has now in the hospital tents at camp, about forty men, most of whom he is apprehensive will not survive. The balance of the sick he is obliged to permit to remain in their tents, having no room for them. Some have the measles, others a fever, which is becoming every day more alarming.

The field officer of the day has also taken a view of the hospital tent of the 13th regiment. Five men were lying there dead. He was told they had been dead for twenty-four hours, and were not buried for want of coffins. The sides of the tent had been forced open by the wind, and the sick men were exposed to the weather. He made inquiries as to the state of the companies, and found them more distressing than those of the 12th regiment.

The field officer of the day begs leave to assure the General that he has no view of paralyzing the operations of the army, by making this report at this important period. He will only say, that, on this and every other occasion he will perform his duty.

DAVID CAMPBELL,
Major 12th Infantry, &c.

HEADQUARTERS, CAMP NEAR BUFFALO,
November 27, 1812.

The men for service in this camp, and those in the vicinity, will cook to-day two days' provision, and have it in their haversacks at retreat.

At reveillee to-morrow, every soldier will put on his knapsack, shoulder his musket, and, prepared for battle, with flints and cartridges, will march to the navy yard, on his way to Canada.

The boats will be ready for the embarkation.

The tents and sick will be left under the care of guards of invalids, until a convenient time.

Friends of your country! Ye who have "the will to do, the heart to dare," the moment ye have wished for has arrived. Think on your country's honors torn; her rights trampled on; her sons enslaved; her infants perishing by the hatchet. Be strong! Be brave! And let the ruffian power of the British King cease on this continent.

ALEX. SMYTH,

Brigadier General, commanding.

No. 37.

Brigadier General Smyth to Colonel Winder.

NOVEMBER 27, 1812.

SIR: Captain King will communicate the order for to-morrow. Lieutenant Colonel Boerstler, with the men fit for service of your regiment, will attack the guard at the bridge, take it, demolish the bridge, bring off or dismount any light artillery found, kill the horses, take the boats, and return to our shore.

The Lieutenant Colonel, with his party, having done what is directed at the bridge, may proceed up the coast, his boats ascending the river, to the Red House to support Captain King and Lieutenant Angus, or act according to circumstances.

It is not intended to keep possession. That is not to be attempted.

You will remain on the bank and give directions.

Let the wounded be hid from the public eye to-morrow.

Let a bright look-out be kept to-day, and allow no one to pass the bridge of Conajouaty, towards Tonawanta, except an officer of the army.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER SMYTH,
Brigadier General commanding.

Copy of an order from Brigadier General Alexander Smyth to Captain King and Lieutenant Angus.

HEADQUARTERS, Nov. 27, 1812.

The detachment under Captain King and Lieutenant Angus will go against the enemy's batteries to-night, and render them useless.

It is not intended they should keep possession; but they will return immediately, bringing off some prisoners, and taking or destroying some light artillery, and killing the horses, if possible.

It is desirable the movement of the detachment, and that under Lieutenant Colonel Boerstler, should be so timed that they might arrive at the same instant.

Brigadier General commanding.

Capt. Wm. King to Brigadier General Alex. Smyth.

FORT GEORGE, Nov. 28, 1812.

DEAR GENERAL: At the very moment that the Manner in which the War has been conducted.

boats (probably coming to my relief) made their appearance yesterday morning, Major Ormsby, at the head of the British army, arrived, and halted in front of the house into which I had thrown myself, with an intention to defend it against any force not greatly superior; but, against the troops under his command, it would have been folly to resist, and I surrendered myself and thirty men prisoners.

To Captains Morgan and Sproul, and Lieutenant Houston, (the only three officers who remained with me,) I refer you for an account of my conduct in the attempt on the batteries, as also of the partial success of the enterprise, which, when you receive, and take into consideration that the boats had carried off the implements for spiking the cannon and destroying the gun carriages, I flatter myself you will be convinced I did my duty as far as circumstances rendered it possible.

May I flatter myself you will exchange the prisoners of the forty-ninth I sent over, and which exceeds in number those taken with me, for the men now here, the names of which I enclose you. For myself, I am less interested; but could I be exchanged for the surgeon I sent over, it would be highly gratifying.

By releasing my prisoners, I could have made my escape with all my men; but I deemed the measure I pursued more honorable, and, therefore, adopted it, and flatter myself it meets your approbation.

I received a shot in the foot at the Red House. The wound itself is trifling, but having been obliged to march the greater part of the way from where I was taken to Chippewa, it caused considerable swelling, and to-day is painful. I received a scratch on the cheek, but fear it is not even deep enough to leave a scar.

A trip to Quebec, at this season of the year, under any circumstances, would be extremely disagreeable, but particularly as a prisoner of war; therefore, if possible, negotiate my exchange; but whatever you may do, my dear sir, let the men taken with me be released.

Should any letters come for me, under cover to you, please keep them until you know what is to be my fate.

I am treated with a degree of politeness that entitles the officers of this garrison to my warmest gratitude.

With high esteem, I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM KING,
Captain 5th Infantry.

BUFFALO, November 30, 1812.

SIR: I am just informed by Major Mowry that you were told that I did not communicate your orders of yesterday to my brigade. Immediately after receiving them I had directed my Brigade Major to take them to camp, for the information of the brigade, but, in a few minutes after I gave this order, several of the field officers who had been ordered to command the men who had volunteered to cross into Canada, came into my quarters, who each, individually, read the orders. I ordered one of the field officers to the navy yard, to carry that part of your orders respecting the boats, into effect. I beg leave to refer you to Major Douglass for a more minute detail.

CAMP CANAJOUATY CREEK,
December 2, 1812.

SIR: I have understood that the 12th and 20th regiments have obtained permission to retire to the interior, for the purpose of taking up their quarters for the Winter. If a permission of that kind can be granted to any of the corps, I pray you to extend that indulgence to the 14th. They have encountered a series of fatigue and hardship, so greatly beyond that of any other corps, that they not only have a claim to be relieved, but the last eight or ten days have so shattered the regiment, both officers and men, that repose and comfort are absolutely necessary to them.

With respect to myself, if you should deem my services of importance, anywhere, I shall most cheerfully yield them; but I beseech you to permit the balance of the regiment to retire to the interior, where vegetables and other food suited to recruit them can be procured.

I was extremely anxious to visit home this Winter, to have completed the adjustment of my private affairs, upon which, in the event of my death, a family will depend for a very slender pittance. But if objects of public service can be more effectually accomplished by my remaining here, in your judgment, I shall with the utmost cheerfulness devote myself to the accomplishment of your wishes.

What order will be taken with the 23d? I have only understood that they were connected with my command in the field.

I called at General Tannehill's quarters after I saw you, but he was sick in bed, and no meeting had or was to take place so far as I could hear.

SIR: I feel happy to inform you that my health is greatly restored, although not sufficiently so as to venture much out of my quarters. Major Douglass waits on you with an inspection return of my late brigade; respectable a few days since, but now reduced by some unaccountable fatality to less than a single regiment. You will discover, from the return, that the officers, as well as the privates, are infected with the same dishonorable contagion—desertion. I am at a loss how to express my feelings on the present state of our little army.

I am at a loss to know what can, or ought to be done with the brigade staff, field and regimental staff, and company officers, who have become supernumerary. I await your special orders how I am to act on the occasion generally. The expenses have been too great already, without any public benefits arising, and to hold them longer would only be an accumulation of the same evil. I am, with due respect, &c.

By a return of the brigade of General Tannehill, of Pennsylvania volunteers, it appears that five captains, four lieutenants, eleven ensigns, eighty-three sergeants, eighty-nine corporals, twenty-five musicians, and nine hundred and thirty privates, had revolted and deserted, leaving for duty only two hundred and sixty-seven privates.

In consequence thereof, General Tannehill will be pleased to organize the remaining non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, into a battalion, under the command of Major Harriett.

A furlough for the residue of the time for which he has been called into service is granted to Brigadier General Tannehill and his brigade staff.

A furlough for the residue of this month is granted to the field officers of General Tannehill's brigade, except Major Harriett; from the expiration of which furlough they shall be considered as discharged the service of the United States.

of absence from the army for seventy-five days, and an order to report myself at the expiration of that time to the Secretary of War. No. 57.

Brigadier General Alexander Smyth to the Secretary of War.

WYTHE, May 11, 1813.

SIR: I hope I shall not be considered as troublesome, in requesting that you will cause an answer to be given to the inquiry, whether I am now considered as an officer of the Army of the United States or not?

There may, I conceive, be several constructions of the law of the last session, relative to the General staff of the army, as it may affect myself. 1. That I continue a Brigadier General of the line. 2. That I am an Inspector General, with reduced rank. 3. That my appointment was a mere staff appointment, the rank only brevet rank, and, consequently, my commission as a Colonel of the army unaffected. 4. That my appointment, although a mere staff appointment, vacated my commission as a Colonel in the line, and that, by the late act, I have been legislated out of office.

Rank in the army, I conceive, is either—1. Rank in the line; 2. Brevet rank, or rank in the staff. All rank that confers command is rank in the line. A promotion in the staff does not take away rank in the line. A promotion that takes away rank in the line must confer rank in the line. An officer commissioned with the rank of a Brigadier General, is an officer in the line. General Greene, Quartermaster General, commanded as an officer of the line. General Steuben, Inspector General, did also. General Hamilton, Inspector General, commanded the whole army.

The late act relative to the army staff expressly provides that the Quartermaster General shall have only brevet rank. It has the expression, "as heretofore;" but this can have no retrospective operation. It cannot make the rank held by General Hamilton mere brevet rank. I have commanded, and been fully recognised by my superiors as an officer in the line. (See sixty-second article Rules and Articles of War.)

I have the honor to be, &c.

Certificate of Lieutenant John G. Camp.

I do certify that, for several days together, I was unable to procure either flour or whiskey from the contractor, and from the 25th October till 15th December, I was unable to procure salt meat more than once or twice, notwithstanding a general order requiring salt provisions three days in a week. Soap, the contractor has been very deficient in, so much that there has been upwards of three hundred pounds due to the 12th and 20th infantry at a time, not being able to get it. The kidney and suet has almost invariably been taken out before the beef was issued, and in no one instance have I been able to procure any vinegar in kind. In a word, the contractor has never issued a complete ration to the 12th or 20th regiment since the 25th December; from which time I have been acting a Quartermaster.

FORT NIAGARA, Nov. 7, 1812.

SIR: I wrote you yesterday at considerable length by Quartermaster Allison. Major Armistead deems it necessary to go to Black Rock, to present to you his ideas of this place in a military point of view.

The Major apprehends that there is risk of enterprise against this place from the other side, and that there is danger of its succeeding, if attempted where the infantry are withdrawn; my opinion, you will recollect, has been, that the enemy would not attempt anything against this end of the line; I am still of the same opinion. How far he might succeed, if he attempted it, would depend upon the force he employed, and the courage and firmness of the resistance here. My practical knowledge of the defence of fortified places does not enable me to form an opinion upon the subject which would be entitled to much weight. Major Armistead is informed of my views of this place as detailed in my letter of the 17th October; but his views are derived more probably from his professional knowledge and skill than from general considerations.

My own opinion is, that a successful effort on any part of the line will be a protection to this place equal to that of any force which might be thrown in here; because I believe the enemy, so far from thinking of attacking us, is exerting every nerve to evade a blow which they dread from us.

Three vessels are just arriving, one was here before; it is not yet perceived that they bring any force.

We are literally starving on this end of the line for bread; and, unless the supply is more abundant, the contractors will be answerable for consequences more fatal to their country than treason.

I am, with very great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

W. H. WINDER,
Colonel Commanding.

LEWISTOWN, Nov. 22, 1812.

SIR: I left Niagara with the intention of seeing you, but finding my horse not able to proceed, I have declined going. My business was to get, if possible, some ammunition for the garrison, as we nearly expended all we had yesterday, and which did the enemy great damage—destroyed one of their best buildings, and did the town considerable damage; sunk a schooner that was sent out of Genesee river, and dismounted several of their guns.

It gives me extreme pleasure to inform you that the officers behaved themselves with the greatest degree of bravery. Captain Leonard was as conspicuous as to coolness and attention as I have ever seen. We, on our part, lost five men—three from the bursting of a gun, and two from the enemy's fire; several wounded from careless loading. If possible, dear sir, send on ammunition for eighteen and six pounds, and fours; but my greatest concern is the want of provisions, which, if not supplied, we will inevitably have to evacuate the post.

TRIAL OF BRIGADIER GENERAL HULL.

ADJUTANT AND INSPECTOR GEN'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 25, 1814.

GENERAL ORDER.

The proceedings of the court martial, in the case of William Hull, Brigadier General in the Army of the United States, having been submitted to the President of the United States, and having been approved by him, the following extract therefrom is ordered to be read at the head of each regiment of the army, and to be published in the National Intelligencer of this city.

By order:

J. B. WALBACH,

Adjutant General.

Trial of General Hull.

At a General Court Martial (ordered by the President of the United States) convened at Albany, in the State of New York, on the third day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and continued, by adjournments, to the twenty-fifth day of March following, Brigadier General William Hull, of the Army of the United States, was tried on the following charges and specifications, viz :

CHARGE I.

Treason against the United States, between the ninth of April and the seventeenth of August, one thousand eight hundred and twelve.

First specification.—In this: That on the first day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve, before that time and ever since, an open and public war was, and is yet, carried on and prosecuted by and between the United States of America and their Territories, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof: and that William Hull, a Brigadier General in the Army of the said United States, a citizen of the said United States, owing allegiance to the said United States, and late Commander of the Northwestern Army of the said United States, well knowing the premises, and traitorously and unlawfully designing and contriving to send and convey intelligence to the said enemies of the said United States, touching a declaration of war by the said United States, against the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof; and also touching the expedition on which the said Northwestern army under his command, as aforesaid, was employed; and also touching the numbers, state, and condition of the said Northwestern army; in prosecution of the said traitorous and unlawful design, on the said first day of July, in the year aforesaid, at the rapids of the river Miami of the lake, in the Territory of Michigan, the said William Hull (then and there being a Brigadier General in the Army of the United States, and being then and there commander of the said Northwestern army as aforesaid) did traitorously hire or cause to be hired, an unarmed vessel, with the pretended purpose of transporting therein certain sick soldiers, and the principal part of the hospital stores belonging to the said Northwestern army, from the said rapids of the river Miami of the lake, to Detroit in the said Territory of Michigan, but, in truth, traitorously contriving and intending that the said unarmed vessel, together with all persons, papers, and things put on board thereof, should be captured by the enemies of the said United States, on the passage of the said unarmed vessel from the said rapids of the river Miami of the lake, to Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid: and that the said William Hull, in further prosecution of his said traitorous and unlawful design and contrivance, (being then and there a Brigadier General in the Army of the United States as aforesaid, and being then and there commander of the said Northwestern army as aforesaid,) did then and there traitorously put, or traitorously cause to be put on board of the said unarmed vessel, a trunk, containing (among other things) the official correspondence of the Secretary of the Department of War and the said Brigadier General William Hull, as well touching the expedition on which the said Northwestern army under his command as aforesaid was then employed, as touching a declaration of war by the said United States against the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dependencies thereof, and also certain official muster-rolls, reports, and returns of the numbers, state and condition of the said Northwestern army under his command as aforesaid: and that afterwards, to wit, on the second day of July, in the year aforesaid, the said vessel so as aforesaid traitorously hired or traitorously caused to be hired, by the said Brigadier General William Hull, on its passage from the said rapids of the river Miami of the lake to Detroit aforesaid, was captured by the said enemies of the United States, having on board thereof, at the time of the said capture, the said trunk containing the said official correspondence, as well touching the said expedition, as the said declaration of war, and the said official muster-rolls, reports and returns of the numbers, state and condition of the said Northwestern army—together with certain sick soldiers, and the principal part of the hospital stores belonging to the said Northwestern army—and by means of the said capture, and in fulfilment of the said traitorous and unlawful design, contrivance, and intentment of the said Brigadier General William Hull, the said official correspondence, as well touching the said expedition, as the said declaration of war, and the said official muster-rolls, reports, and returns of the numbers, state and condition of the said Northwestern Army—together with certain sick soldiers, and the principal part of the hospital stores of the said Northwestern army—came to the possession, knowledge, and use of the enemies of the said United States; giving information and intelligence to the enemies of the said United States, as well touching the said expedition as touching the said declaration of war; and also touching the numbers, state, and condition of the said Northwestern army of the said United States, then and there under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid; whereby the said William Hull, on the first day of July, in the year aforesaid, at the rapids of the river Miami of the lake aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, (being then and there a Brigadier General in the Army of the United States, and being then and there commander of the said Northwestern army as aforesaid, and being then and there a citizen of the said United States, owing allegiance to the said United States) did then and there traitorously and unlawfully hold correspondence with and give intelligence to the enemy, and did then and there traitorously, by the means aforesaid, adhere to the enemies of the said United States, giving them aid and comfort.

Second specification.—And also in this: That afterwards and during the said war, so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, the said Northwestern army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, having entered the said British province of Upper Canada, and having established a military post at or near Sandwich, in the said British province of Upper Canada, which it was the duty of the said Brigadier General William Hull to maintain and defend, in order that the said war might and should be advantageously carried on and prosecuted, on behalf of the said United States, and more especially that a certain British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, in the said British province of Upper Canada, occupied by the enemies of the said United States, might and should be advantageously attacked and taken by the said Northwestern army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, yet the said William Hull, (a Brigadier General in the Army of the said United States, a citizen of the said United States, owing allegiance to the United States, and commander of the said Northwestern army of the said United States as aforesaid,) well knowing the premises, on the eighth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve, at Sandwich aforesaid, in the British province of Upper Canada aforesaid, did then and there traitorously and unlawfully conspire and combine with certain enemies of the said United States, (whose names are unknown,) to quit and abandon to the enemies of the said United States the said military post established by the said Northwestern army of the said United States, at or near Sandwich aforesaid, in the British province of Upper Canada aforesaid, and to prevent the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, from being attacked and reduced, or an attempt being made to reduce the same, by the said Northwestern army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid; and that the said William Hull (then and there a Brigadier General in the Army of the said United States, then and there being commander of the said Northwestern army of the said United States, and then and there being a citizen of the said United States, owing allegiance to the said United States) in prosecution of the said traitorous conspiracy and combination, did then and there traitorously quit and abandon, and did then and there traitorously cause to be quitted and abandoned, the said military post established by the said Northwestern army of the said United States as aforesaid, at or near Sandwich as aforesaid, in the British province of Upper Canada aforesaid, and did then and there traitorously neglect and omit to make the proper preparations for attacking and reducing, or attempting to reduce the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, but on the contrary did then and there traitorously prevent the same from being attacked and reduced, and an attempt being made to reduce the same by the said Northwestern army of the said United States, then and there under his command as aforesaid; and in further prosecution of the said traitorous conspiracy and combination, did then and there traitorously march, withdraw, and remove, and traitorously order to be marched, withdrawn and removed, the main body of the said Northwestern army of the said United States, from the said military post established by the said Northwestern army of the said United States, at or near Sandwich aforesaid, to a place out of the said British province of Upper Canada, to wit: to Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid; whereby the said William Hull, on the said eighth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, at Sandwich aforesaid, in the said British province of Upper Canada, (being then and there a Brigadier General in the Army of the said United States, and being then and there commander of the said Northwestern army of the said United States, and being then and there a citizen of the said United States, owing allegiance to the said United States) did then and there traitorously conspire, combine, and hold correspondence with the enemies of the said United States, and did then and there traitorously and shamefully quit and abandon, and traitorously and shamefully cause to be quitted and abandoned, the said military post, so as aforesaid established by the said Northwestern army of the said United States, at or near Sandwich aforesaid, in the British province of Upper Canada aforesaid, and did then and there traitorously neglect and omit to make the proper preparations for attacking and reducing, or attempting to reduce the said fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, in the said British province of Upper Canada, but did then and there traitorously prevent the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, in the said British province of Upper Canada, from being attacked and reduced, or an attempt being made to reduce the same by the said Northwestern army of the said United States, under his command as aforesaid; and by the means aforesaid, did then and there traitorously adhere to the enemies of the said United States, giving them aid and comfort.

Third specification.—And, also, in this: That afterwards and during the said war so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted, by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, to wit: on the sixteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, at Detroit, in the Michigan Territory aforesaid, the said William Hull was then and there a citizen of the said United States, owing allegiance to the said United States, and was then and there a Brigadier General in the Army of the said United States, and was then and there commander of the Northwestern army of the United States, and was then and there commander of a certain fort, called Fort Detroit, and belonging to the said United States, erected at or near the town of Detroit, upon a bank of the river Detroit, in the said Territory of Michigan; the works whereof, and the guns and gun-carriages belonging thereto, then were, and long before had been decayed, dilapidated, and out of repair. And that the said Brigadier General William Hull, then and there did traitorously conspire and combine with certain enemies of the said United States, (whose names are unknown,) then and there traitorously and shamefully to surrender and abandon to the enemies of the said United States, the said fort, called Fort Detroit, belonging to the said United States, as aforesaid, and then and there, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, with all the troops, regulars as well as militia, then and there under the command of the said Brigadier General Hull as aforesaid, and all the public stores and arms, and all public documents, including everything else of a public nature, appertaining to the said fort, called Fort Detroit, and to the said Northwestern army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid. And that in prosecution of the said traitorous conspiracy and combination, the said Brigadier General William Hull did then and there wilfully and traitorously neglect and omit to repair and strengthen the works of the said fort, called Fort Detroit, then and there under his command as aforesaid, and to put the same, (together with the said guns and gun-carriages belonging thereto) into a proper state and condition for resistance and defence against the approaches, attacks, and assaults of the enemies of the said United States. And did then and there wilfully and traitorously neglect and omit to fortify the places and passes at and near to the said fort, called Fort Detroit, by and through which the troops of the enemies of the said United States might then and there reasonably be expected to approach, and did approach, the said fort, called Fort Detroit, for the purpose of attacking and subduing the same. And did then and there traitorously neglect and omit to oppose, resist, repel, and defeat, and to attempt to repel and defeat the troops of the enemies of the said United States, in their hostile preparations, and approach to and towards the said fort, called Fort Detroit, for the purpose of attacking and subduing the same. And that, in further prosecution and completion of the said traitorous conspiracy and combination, the said Brigadier General William Hull did then and there traitorously and shamefully abandon and surrender the said fort, called Fort Detroit, then and there under his command as aforesaid, (which it was his duty then and there to maintain and defend,) together with all the troops, regulars as well as militia, then and there in the said fort, called Fort Detroit, then and there belonging to the said United States as aforesaid, and then and there under his command as aforesaid, and all the public stores and arms, and public documents, including everything else of a public nature, in and appertaining to the said fort, called Fort Detroit, and to the said Northwestern army of the said United States, then and there under his command as aforesaid, unto the enemies of the said United States, to wit: to the British forces then and there under the command of Major General Brock; whereby the said William Hull, on the said sixteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve, aforesaid, at Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, (being then and there a citizen of the said United States, owing allegiance to the said United States, and being then and there a Brigadier General in the Army of the said United States, and being then and there commander of the said Northwestern army of the said United States, and being then and there commander of the said fort, called Fort Detroit, belonging to the said United States as aforesaid,) did then and there traitorously and shamefully abandon and surrender the said fort, called Fort Detroit, to the enemies of the said United States, to wit: to the said British troops under the command of Major General Brock, as aforesaid; and did then and there by the means aforesaid traitorously adhere to the enemies of the said United States, giving them aid and comfort.

CHARGE II.

Cowardice at and in the neighborhood of Detroit, between the first day of July and the seventeenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve.

First specification.—In this: That during the said war so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, the said Brigadier General William Hull, commanding the Northwestern army of the said United States as aforesaid, having entered the said British province of Upper Canada, in prosecution of the said war on behalf of the said United States, and being there in possession of the town of Sandwich and the adjacent country, in the name and on behalf of the said United States, and having declared and avowed the object and intention of attacking and subduing the British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, in the said British province of Upper Canada, and, generally, of maintaining and enlarging his position and possession in the said British province of Upper Canada, on the eighth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve, at Sandwich aforesaid, in the British province of Upper Canada aforesaid, did then and there misbehave himself before the enemy, and shamefully manifest an undue fear, and apprehension of danger, by a course of conduct and conversation evincing personal alarm, agitation of mind and privation of judgment, by abandoning the said object and design of attacking the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, by quitting the position and possession taken at the town of Sandwich and in the adjacent country, in the British province of Upper Canada as aforesaid, and by retreating abruptly from and out of the said British province of Upper Canada to Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, without any cause for so doing, arising from the superior numbers, state, and condition of the British forces which were then and there opposed to the said Army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull, and without any other just and sufficient cause whatsoever; whereby the officers and soldiers of the said Northwestern army of the said United States then and there under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull, were induced to lose and did lose all confidence in the personal courage and military capacity of their said commander; the inhabitants of the said British province of Upper Canada were taught to distrust the power and professions of the invading General; a shade was cast upon the reputation of the American arms; and the service of the said United States, in the prosecution of the said war, suffered great detriment and disadvantage.

Second specification.—And, also, in this: That during the said war so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, to wit: on the fifteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, the enemy having raised certain batteries on the banks of the said river Detroit, in the said British province of Upper Canada, opposite the said fort Detroit, and certain American posts and batteries established and erected near the said fort Detroit, in the said Territory of Michigan, and a cannonade being commenced from the said batteries of the enemy against and upon the said fort Detroit and the said American posts and batteries established and erected near thereto, in the said Territory of Michigan, the said Brigadier General William Hull, on the said fifteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, at Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, (being then and there commander of the said fort Detroit, and of the said American posts and batteries established and erected near thereto, in the said Territory of Michigan, and being then and there commander of the said northwestern army of the said United States,) did then and there, during the continuance of the cannonade aforesaid, shamefully misbehave himself before the enemy, and manifest great fear and apprehension of personal danger, by a course of conduct and conversation evincing personal alarm, agitation of mind, and privation of judgment, and particularly by various timid and cowardly actions and expressions then and there used and uttered in the presence of the officers and soldiers then and there belonging to the said Northwestern army of the said United States, and then and there under his command as aforesaid, as well in the public streets of the town of Detroit as in places adjacent to the said fort of Detroit, and the said American posts and batteries established and erected near thereto, in the said Territory of Michigan; whereby, a fatal encouragement was afforded for the hostile enterprises of the enemy, a pernicious example (calculated to intimidate and to disorganize) was given to the American troops, and the service of the United States, in the prosecution of the said war, was exposed to hazard, shame, and disappointment.

Third specification.—And, also, in this: That during the said war, carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, to wit: on the sixteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, the British forces under the command of Major General Brock having crossed the said river Detroit, having landed at a place called Spring Wells, otherwise called Spring Hill, in the said Territory of Michigan, and having thence marched towards the said fort of Detroit with the design to attack the same, the said Brigadier General Hull, on the said sixteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, at Detroit aforesaid, in the said Territory of Michigan, (being then and there commander of the said fort of Detroit, and being then and there commander of the said Northwestern army of the said United States,) did then and there, during all the time of the enemy's crossing the said river Detroit as aforesaid, landing at the said Spring Wells, otherwise called Spring Hill as aforesaid, and marching towards the said Fort Detroit as aforesaid, with the design to attack the same as aforesaid, shamefully misbehave himself before the enemy, and manifest great fear and apprehension of personal danger, by various timid and cowardly actions and expressions then and there used and uttered in the presence of the officers and soldiers belonging to the said Northwestern army of the said United States, then and there under his command as aforesaid; by avoiding all personal danger from making an attempt to prevent the enemy's crossing the said river Detroit and landing at the said Spring Wells, otherwise called Spring Hill; by avoiding all personal danger from reconnoitering and encountering the enemy in battle on the said march of the enemy towards the said fort of Detroit; by hastily sending flags of truce to the enemy, with overtures for a capitulation; by anxiously withdrawing his person from the American troops in the open field to a place of comparative safety, within the walls of the said Fort Detroit; by an irresolute fluctuation of orders, sometimes inconsistent with each other, and sometimes incoherent in themselves; by forbidding the American artillery to fire on the army on the said march of the enemy towards the said Fort Detroit; by calling the American troops from the field, and crowding them in the said Fort Detroit, while the enemy was on the said march towards the said Fort Detroit; by a precipitate declaration to the enemy that he surrendered the said Fort Detroit and the said Northwestern army of the said United States before terms of capitulation were signed or considered, or even suggested; and, generally, by a course of conduct and conversation evincing personal fear, agitation of mind, and privation of judgment; whereby the said fort of Detroit, and the said Northwestern army of the said United States, then and there under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull, were then and there rendered an easy and certain conquest to the approaching enemy; the officers and soldiers of a gallant army (compelled by the obligations of military law to obey the orders of their commander) were exposed to unmerited mortification and reproach; and the service of the said United States, in the prosecution of the said war, suffered great detriment and discredit.

Fourth specification.—And, also, in this: That during the said war so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, to wit: on the sixteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, at Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, the said Fort Detroit being then and there well garrisoned and supplied with cannon, ammunition, and provisions; the said Northwestern army of the said United States being then and there well supplied with arms, ammunition, and provisions; and the officers and soldiers thereof being then and there in high spirits, and eager to meet and encounter the enemy in battle; and a fine train of artillery being then and there subject to the orders and disposal of the said Brigadier General Hull, for the purpose of defence or attack, yet the said Brigadier General William Hull, (then and there being commander of the said fort of Detroit, and of the said Northwestern army of the said United States,) acting upon the impulse of personal fear and apprehension, and contemplating, as the means of personal safety, a shameful abandonment and the surrender of the said Fort Detroit, and of the said Northwestern army of the said United States, under his command as aforesaid, to the approaching enemy, did then and there shamefully misbehave himself before the enemy, and did then and there enter into a disgraceful capitulation with the enemy, containing no consolatory stipulation that the said garrison and army should march out of the said fort of Detroit with the honors of war; no just and humane stipulation for the security and protection of such of the inhabitants of the said British province of Upper Canada as had accepted the said Brigadier General William Hull's invitation to join the American standard; nor any reasonable stipulation for an opportunity of reporting to the Secretary for the Department of War the circumstances of so unexpected and so important an event; and did then and there shamefully abandon, surrender, and give up the said fort of Detroit, together with all the troops, regulars as well as militia, then and there under his command as aforesaid, and all the public stores and arms, and all the public documents, including everything else of a public nature belonging to the said fort of Detroit, and to the said Northwestern army of the said United States, then and there under his command as aforesaid, to the said approaching enemy, to wit: to the British forces under the command of Major General Brock, without any cause for so doing, arising from the superior numbers, state, and condition of the said British forces; or from the actual want, or just expectation of sudden want, of arms, ammunition, and provisions for the said Fort Detroit, and the said Northwestern army of the said United States, and without any other adequate cause whatsoever; whereby the territorial sovereignty, rights, and property of the said United States were shamefully ceded to the enemy; a brave and patriotic army was wantonly sacrificed by the personal fears of the commander; and the service of the said United States, in the prosecution of the said war, suffered a great and afflicting loss.

CHARGE III.

Neglect of duty and unofficerlike conduct, while commanding a separate army, between the ninth of April and the seventeenth of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve.

First specification.—In this: That before and during the said war, carried on and prosecuted as aforesaid, by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dependencies thereof, the said Brigadier General William Hull, being duly appointed to command the Northwestern army of the said United States, did actually take and assume the command of the said army, on or about the twenty-fifth day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve, at or near Dayton, in the State of Ohio, and did thence constantly continue in the actual command of the said army, as well on the march from Dayton aforesaid, to Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, and at Detroit aforesaid, as in the British province of Upper Canada, until his capitulation with the enemy, and the consequent surrender of Fort Detroit, in the said Michigan Territory, with all the troops, regulars, and militia under his command, to the British forces under the command of Major General Brock, to wit: at Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, on the sixteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid. And that the said Brigadier General William Hull, unmindful of the important trust reposed in him, during all the time aforesaid, and as well on the march of the said army from Dayton aforesaid, to Detroit aforesaid, and at Detroit aforesaid, as in the British province of Upper Canada aforesaid, was guilty of neglect of duty and of unofficerlike conduct, by neglecting and omitting, with sufficient care and frequency, to inspect, train, exercise, review, and order, and to cause to be inspected, trained, exercised, reviewed, and ordered, the said army under his command as aforesaid; and, also, by neglecting and omitting, in due form and time, to prepare an order of battle, and to make the same known to the said army on the march from Dayton aforesaid, to Detroit aforesaid, in the Michigan

Trial of General Hull.

Territory aforesaid, whereby the discipline of the troops under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, was in danger of being relaxed; their comfort was liable to be impaired; their confidence in the military skill and dispositions of their commander was diminished; and the said army was exposed to the hazard of disorder and defeat in the event of an attack being made thereon by the enemy.

Second specification.—And also in this: That during the said war, so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, to wit: on or about the first day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, at the rapids of the river Miami, in the Territory of Michigan, the said Brigadier General William Hull, then and there commanding the said Northwestern army of the said United States, on the march thereof from Dayton, in the State of Ohio, to Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, then and there having sufficient cause to know or to believe that war then existed between the said United States and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, was guilty of neglect of duty and of unofficerlike conduct, by then and there hiring, or causing to be hired, an unarmed vessel, and putting, or causing to be put, on board thereof, to be transported by water-passage from the said rapids of the river Miami, of the lake, to Detroit aforesaid, (the said Brigadier General William Hull having sufficient cause to know or to believe the imminent danger of capture by the enemy to which the said unarmed vessel on the passage aforesaid would be exposed,) certain sick soldiers, and a great part of the hospital stores belonging to the said army, together with a trunk, containing (among other things) the papers hereinafter mentioned, which it was the duty of the said Brigadier General William Hull most carefully to keep and preserve from the knowledge and view of the enemy, that is to say: the official correspondence of the Secretary of the Department of War and the said Brigadier General William Hull, as well touching the expedition on which the said Northwestern army under his command as aforesaid was then employed, as touching a declaration of war by the said United States of America against the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof; and, also, certain other official muster-rolls, reports, and returns of the numbers, state, and condition of the said army under his command as aforesaid. And the said unarmed vessel, on the passage aforesaid from the said rapids of the river Miami of the lake towards Detroit aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on or about the second day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, was captured by the enemy, having on board thereof, at the time of such capture, the said sick soldiers, the said hospital stores, and the said trunk, containing the said official correspondence, and also the said muster-rolls, reports, and returns of the numbers, state, and condition of the said army; whereby the said sick soldiers were made prisoners of war; the said hospital stores were lost to the United States; and the said official correspondence, and the said muster-rolls, reports, and returns of the number, state, and condition of the said army, came to the possession, knowledge, and use of the enemies of the United States, to the great injury of the said United States.

Third specification.—And also in this: That during the said war, so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, the said Brigadier General William Hull having arrived, with the said Northwestern army of the said United States under his command as aforesaid, at Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, on the seventh day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid; and having the possession and command of the said fort of Detroit from that time, constantly, until the abandonment and surrender thereof to the British forces under the command of Major General Brock, on the sixteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid; and finding, upon his said arrival at Detroit aforesaid, that the works of the said Fort Detroit were greatly damaged and dilapidated, and that the guns and gun-carriages belonging to the said fort of Detroit were also damaged and out of repair; and, moreover, well knowing the importance of the said Fort Detroit to the service of the said United States in the operations of the said war, and that the same (together with the said guns and gun-carriages) should be put and kept in proper order and repair, was guilty of neglect of duty by neglecting and omitting, during all the time of his possession and command as aforesaid, in a proper and sufficient manner to repair and strengthen, or cause to be repaired and strengthened, the works of the said Fort Detroit; by neglecting and omitting, in a proper and sufficient manner, and in due time for the service of the said United States, to repair, or cause to be repaired, the said guns and gun-carriages; and, generally, by neglecting and omitting to put, or cause to be put, the said fort of Detroit in a proper state and condition for resistance and defence in the event of an invasion and attack by the enemy; whereby the said Fort Detroit was left an easy conquest to the enemy; the said guns and gun-carriages being afterwards required for the service of the said United States, in the British province of Upper Canada, were still found unfit for transportation and use; great time was consumed in preparing and fitting them for the said service; and the operations of the war were fatally obstructed and suspended.

Fourth specification.—And, also, in this: That during the said war so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, the said Brigadier

Trial of General Hull.

General William Hull, declaring and avowing an intention and design, with the said Northwestern army of the said United States under his command as aforesaid, to invade and enter the British province of Upper Canada, to invest and attack the British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg in the said British province, and to maintain and enlarge his position and possession in the said British province, and well knowing that expedition, resolution, and energy were indispensable to the prosecution and accomplishment of such intention and design, and having arrived at Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, on the seventh day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, and having invaded the said British province of Upper Canada, on the twelfth day of July, in the year aforesaid, and therein taken possession of the town of Sandwich aforesaid, and having with the main body of his said army evacuated the said British province of Upper Canada on the eighth day of August, in the year aforesaid, was guilty of neglect of duty and unofficerlike conduct, by not seasonably repairing, fitting, and transporting, or causing to be repaired, fitted, and transported, the guns and gun carriages which were necessary to the operations of the war in the said British province of Upper Canada, by an useless and injurious waste of time and opportunity at Sandwich aforesaid, in the said British province of Upper Canada, without making an attempt to reduce the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, by an unnecessary consumption of time, in projects to conciliate the British inhabitants of the said British province of Upper Canada, and the neighboring Indians, without resorting to a more effectual display of a military power, capacity, and disposition to maintain the acquisitions of conquest, and to perform the promises of protection; by postponing in the first instance, and by abandoning in the next, an investment and attack upon the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, and by finally evacuating the said British province of Upper Canada, without having provided effectually, in any respect, for the safety of the inhabitants thereof, who had accepted the said Brigadier General William Hull's invitation to join the American standard, and without having, in any degree, accomplished the said intention and design of the said Brigadier General William Hull, so as aforesaid declared and avowed upon the invasion of the said British province as aforesaid; whereby an opportunity was afforded to the enemy to bring into suspicion and contempt the power and the conduct of the American commander; to collect and combine the British forces; to seduce, intimidate, and engage the Indians; to awe into submission the wavering inhabitants of the said British province of Upper Canada; to reinforce the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg; and to prepare for investing and attacking the said fort of Detroit, in the said Territory of Michigan; while, on the other hand, the said army of the United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull, as aforesaid, diminished in effective numbers in consequence of sickness and other casualties; the officers and soldiers naturally became dissatisfied and disgusted with a scene of such inactivity, irresolution, and procrastination; the hope of support and co-operation, as well from the Indians as from the British inhabitants of the said British province of Upper Canada, was destroyed, and the general ardor of the troops in the prosecution of the war insensibly abated.

Fifth specification.—And, also, in this: That during the continuance of the said war, carried on and prosecuted as aforesaid, by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, the said Brigadier General William Hull, with the said Northwestern army of the said United States under his command aforesaid, arrived at Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, to wit: on the 7th day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid; that with the said army under his command as aforesaid, he entered and invaded the said British province of Upper Canada, to wit: on the twelfth day of July, in the year aforesaid; that with the main body of the said army under his command as aforesaid, he evacuated the said British province of Upper Canada on the eighth day of August, in the year aforesaid, thence returning to Detroit aforesaid, in the said Territory of Michigan, and that he abandoned, surrendered, and gave up the said Fort Detroit, with all the troops, regulars as well as militia, under his command as aforesaid, to the British forces under the command of Major General Brock, to wit: on the sixteenth day of August, in the year aforesaid. And that during all the movements aforesaid, and during all the time aforesaid, to wit: from the said seventh day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, to and including the said sixteenth day of August, in the year aforesaid, it was of high importance to the security and supply of the said Fort Detroit, and the said army of the United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, that a free and open communication should be had and preserved between the said fort of Detroit and the said army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, and a certain American settlement and military post made and established at the river Raisin, in the said Territory of Michigan; and that the said Brigadier General William Hull, well knowing the premises, but unmindful of the trust reposed in him, was guilty of neglect of duty and unofficerlike conduct, by suffering the enemy to interrupt and cut off the said communication between the said fort of Detroit and the said army of the said United States under his command as aforesaid, and the said American settlement and military post made and established at the river Raisin aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, to wit: on the first day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, or on some other day of the said month of August, or on some day of the preceding month of July, in the year aforesaid; also, by afterwards, to wit: on the fourth day of August, in the year aforesaid, detaching Major Thomas B. Van Horne, of Colonel James Findley's regiment of Ohio volunteers, with an inadequate force (the said Brigadier General William Hull having sufficient cause for knowing or believing the same to be inadequate) to attempt again to open the said communication between the said fort Detroit, and the said army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, and the said American settlement and military post on the said river Raisin, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid; also, by afterwards, to wit: on the eighth day of August, in the year aforesaid, detaching Lieutenant Colonel James Miller, of the 5th regiment of United States infantry with the number or about the number of five hundred men to attempt again to open the said communication between the said Fort of Detroit and the said army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull, and the said American settlement and military post at the said river Raisin, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, and neglecting to furnish and forward, or cause to be furnished and forwarded, the said last mentioned detachment at or near Brownstown, in the said Territory of Michigan, on its march aforesaid, upon the service aforesaid, an adequate supply of provision, (the said Brigadier General William Hull having sufficient cause to know or to believe that the said last mentioned detachment was at or near Brownstown aforesaid, on its march aforesaid, upon the service aforesaid, in want of provisions, and that they could not prosecute and accomplish the said service unless an adequate supply of provisions was furnished and forwarded to them at or near Brownstown aforesaid;) and, also, by afterwards, to wit: on the fourteenth day of August, in the year aforesaid, detaching Colonel Duncan McArthur, colonel of a regiment of Ohio volunteers, and Colonel Lewis Cass, colonel of another regiment of Ohio volunteers, with the number, or about the number of four hundred men, as well to attempt again to open the said communication between the said Fort Detroit and the said army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, and the said American settlement and military post at the river Raisin aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, as to escort certain provisions from the said American settlement and military post to Detroit aforesaid, without issuing, furnishing, and forwarding, or causing to be issued, furnished, and forwarded, to the said last mentioned detachment an adequate supply of provisions for the service on which they were employed as aforesaid, (the said Brigadier General William Hull having sufficient cause to know or to believe that the said last mentioned detachment was in want of a further supply of provisions upon the service aforesaid, and that they could not prosecute and accomplish the said service unless such further supply was issued, furnished, and forwarded to them,) whereby the said detachment, under the said Major Thomas B. Van Horne, being encountered by the enemy with a superior force was defeated, and returned to Detroit aforesaid, without accomplishing the service on which they were employed as aforesaid; the said detachment under the said Lieutenant Colonel James Miller, having achieved a signal victory over the enemy during the march on the service aforesaid, at or near Brownstown aforesaid, were nevertheless compelled, from the want of an adequate supply of provisions, to abandon the service on which they were employed as aforesaid, and to return to Detroit aforesaid; the said detachment under the said Colonel Duncan McArthur and the said Colonel Lewis Cass, from want of an adequate supply of provisions were unable to prosecute and accomplish the service on which they were employed as aforesaid, and were returning to Detroit aforesaid, at the time of the abandonment and surrender of the said Fort Detroit and the said army of the said United States to the British forces under the command of Major General Brock as aforesaid; and finally, the said communication between the said Fort Detroit and the said army of the said United States, under the command of the said Brigadier General William Hull, and the said American settlement and military post at the said river Raisin, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, by reason of the said neglects and omissions of the said Brigadier General William Hull as aforesaid, was and remained interrupted and totally cut off by the enemy, to wit: from the said first day of August, in the year aforesaid, or from some other day in the said month of August, or in the preceding month of July, in the year aforesaid, to and including the said sixteenth day of August, in the year aforesaid.

Sixth specification.—And, also, in this: That during the continuance of the said war, so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted, by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dependencies thereof, the said Brigadier General William Hull, with the said Northwestern army of the said United States, under his command as aforesaid, having invaded and entered the said British province of Upper Canada as aforesaid, and having declared and avowed an intention and design of investing and attacking the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, in the said British province of Upper Canada, and a detachment of the said army under his command aforesaid, led by the said Colonel Lewis Cass, and the said Lieutenant Colonel James Miller, having attacked and repulsed the enemy, and seized upon a certain bridge over the river called the river Aux Canard, on the route from

Trial of General Hull.

Sandwich, in the said British province of Upper Canada, to the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg; yet the said Brigadier General William Hull well knowing the premises, and unmindful of the trust reposed in him, to wit: on or about the eighteenth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, at Sandwich aforesaid, in the British province of Upper Canada aforesaid, was guilty of neglect of duty and unofficerlike conduct, by neglecting and omitting to advance with the said army under his command as aforesaid, to maintain or attempt to maintain the possession of the said bridge over the said river, called the river Aux Canard, and by neglecting and omitting to proceed to the immediate investment and attack of the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, in the said British province of Upper Canada, whereby the advantage of acquiring and keeping possession of the said bridge over the said river called the river Aux Canard, as aforesaid, was improvidently lost, and the prospect of a successful investment and attack upon the said British fort called Malden, otherwise called Amherstburg, speedily vanished.

Seventh specification.—And, also, in this: That during the continuance of the said war, so as aforesaid carried on and prosecuted by and between the said United States of America and their Territories, and the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, the said Brigadier General William Hull, with the said Northwestern army of the said United States under his command as aforesaid, having evacuated the said British province of Upper Canada, returning thence to Detroit aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid, the enemy having afterwards taken possession of the bank of the said river Detroit, opposite to Detroit aforesaid, and thereon erected batteries wherewith to attack and annoy as well the said fort of Detroit, and the American posts and batteries erected and established near thereto as the town of Detroit, in the said Territory of Michigan, the enemy having also manifested an intention and design to invade and enter the said Territory of Michigan, and to invest and attack the said Fort Detroit; and the enemy having also, afterwards, in pursuance of such intention and design, landed at a place called Spring Wells, otherwise called Spring Hill, in the neighborhood of the said Fort Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid; yet the said Brigadier General William Hull, well knowing the premises, and unmindful of the trust reposed in him, to wit: from the eleventh day of August to and including the sixteenth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve aforesaid, was guilty of neglect of duty and unofficerlike conduct, by neglecting and omitting to prevent, and to attempt to prevent, the enemy from erecting the said batteries on the bank of the said river Detroit, opposite to the said fort of Detroit aforesaid; by neglecting and omitting to fortify the landing place at the said Spring Wells, otherwise called Spring Hill, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid; and by neglecting and omitting to annoy and attack the enemy on and after his landing at Spring Wells, otherwise called Spring Hill aforesaid, in the Territory of Michigan aforesaid; whereby the enemy was enabled securely to erect the said batteries on the bank of the said river Detroit as aforesaid, for attacking and annoying as well the said fort of Detroit and the American posts and batteries erected and established near thereto, as the said town of Detroit, to invade the said Territory of Michigan, without opposition or loss, and to approach the said Fort Detroit, with the air and confidence of a triumph.

A. J. DALLAS,
Judge Advocate.

WEDNESDAY, January 5.

The court met at the Capitol, pursuant to adjournment. Present, all the members.

General Hull having appeared, the charges and specifications were read to him by the Judge Advocate; and being asked if he was ready to plead to them, answered that he was, and that he pleaded not guilty to all the charges and specifications.

FRIDAY, March 25.

All the evidence being read, (whether on the part of the prosecution or the defence,) applicable to the first charge, and the specifications attached to that charge, and after due deliberation had thereon, the court express the following opinion:

The accused having, in his final defence, protested against the jurisdiction of the court to try the charge of treason, and the opinion of the court being, that the objection would have been tenable if the same had been pleaded by the accused on his arraignment; and believing, also, that the court cannot acquire jurisdiction of the offence by the waiver or consent of the accused, they decline making any formal decision on that charge. The evidence on the subject having, however, been publicly given, the court deem it proper, in justice to the accused, to say that they do not believe, from anything that has appeared before them, that Brigadier General William Hull has committed treason against the United States.

On the second charge, and the specifications attached to that charge, (after hearing all the evidence and defence, and after due deliberation thereon,) the court find Brigadier General William Hull guilty of the first, second, and fourth specifications under that charge; and also guilty of the third specification under that charge, except that part which charges the said Brigadier General William Hull with "forbidding the American artillery to fire on the enemy on their march towards the said Fort Detroit."

The court find the said Brigadier General William Hull guilty of the second charge.

On the third charge, the court, after having heard the evidence, (as well as the defence,) and after due deliberation, find the said Brigadier General William Hull guilty of neglect of duty and unofficerlike conduct, as charged in the first specification under this charge, in omitting, with sufficient care and frequency, to inspect, train, exercise, and order, and to cause to be trained, inspected, exercised, and ordered, the troops under his command, from the sixth day of July until the seventeenth day of August, 1812; and acquit him of the residue of the charge contained in that specification.

Naval General Order.

The court acquit the said Brigadier General William Hull of the second and third specifications of the same charge.

The court find the said Brigadier General William Hull guilty of the whole of the fourth specification of that charge, except that part which charges him with not seasonably repairing, fitting, and transporting, or causing to be fitted, repaired, and transported, the guns and gun-carriages which were necessary to the operations of the war in the said British province of Upper Canada.

The court find the said Brigadier General William Hull guilty of so much of the fifth specification to that charge as relates to neglect of duty and unofficerlike conduct, in suffering his communication with the river Raisin and the State of Ohio to be cut off, and sending Major Van Horne to attempt to open the same with an inadequate force; he, the said Brigadier General William Hull, having reason to know or believe the same was insufficient; and the court acquit him of the residue of that specification.

The court find the said Brigadier General William Hull guilty of the sixth and seventh specifications of that charge.

The court find the said Brigadier General William Hull guilty of the third charge.

SATURDAY, March 26.

The court met pursuant to adjournment. Present, all the members.

The court, in consequence of their determination respecting the second and third charges, and the specifications under these charges, exhibited against the said Brigadier General William Hull, and after due consideration, do sentence him to be shot to death—two-thirds of the court concurring in the sentence.

The court, in consideration of Brigadier General Hull's revolutionary services, and his advanced age, earnestly recommend him to the mercy of the President of the United States.

MONDAY, March 28.

The court met pursuant to adjournment. Present, all the members.

The proceedings having been read over, and approved and signed by the President, the court then adjourned sine die.

President of the Court.

Special Judge Advocate.

The sentence of the court is approved, and the execution of it remitted.

By directions of the Court Martial, the President gave the following directions to General Hull:

"ALBANY, March 28, 1814.

"SIR: You will please return to your usual place of residence in Massachusetts, and there continue until you shall receive orders from the President of the United States.

NAVAL GENERAL ORDER.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, July 29, 1813.

The palpable and criminal intercourse held with the enemy's forces, blockading and invading the waters and shores of the United States, is, in a military view, an offence so deep a die as to call for the vigilant interposition of all the Naval officers of the United States.

This intercourse is not only carried on by foreigners, under the specious garb of friendly flags, who convey provisions, water, and succors of all kinds, (ostensibly destined for friendly ports, in the face, too, of a declared and rigorous blockade,) direct to the fleets and stations of the enemy, with constant intelligence of our naval and military force and preparation, and the means of continuing and conducting the invasion, to the greatest possible annoyance of the country; but the same traffic, intercourse, and intelligence is carried on with great subtlety and treachery by profligate citizens, who, in vessels ostensibly navigating our own waters, from port to port, under cover of night, or other circumstances favoring their turpitude, find means to convey succors or intelligence to the enemy, and elude the penalty of the law. This lawless traffic and intercourse is also carried on to a great extent in craft, whose capacity exempts them from the regulations of the revenue laws, and from the vigilance which vessels of greater capacity attract.

I am, therefore, commanded by the President of the United States to enjoin and direct all naval commanding officers to exercise the strictest vigilance, and to stop and detain all vessels or craft, whatsoever, proceeding, or apparently intending to proceed, towards the enemy's vessels within the waters, or hovering about the harbors of the United States; or towards any station occupied by the enemy within the jurisdiction of the United States, from which vessels or craft the enemy might derive succors or intelligence.

CAPTURE OF THE BRITISH FLEET ON LAKE ERIE AND BRIG BOXER.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 31, 1813.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT,

December 27, 1813.

SIR: Agreeably to your request, I have the honor to transmit copies of the official letter and documents narrating the splendid and decisive victory gained on the 10th of September, on Lake Erie, by the United States' squadron under the command of Captain Oliver Hazard Perry, over a British squadron of superior force, commanded by a distinguished veteran officer.

The effects of this victory are no less important to the national interest and security, than the unrivalled splendor of the achievement and generous sympathy of the victors is honorable to the national character.

While the heroic commander of the American squadron justly merits the highest honors which the expression of the National Councils can bestow, the second in command on that eventful day appears to merit particular distinction, for the important and decisive share he had in that glorious event; and it is grateful in the highest degree to reflect that every officer and man, on that trying occasion, discharged his duty to the nation with zeal, fidelity, and honor.

I have the honor also to enclose copies of the official accounts of the action between the United States' brig Enterprise and the British sloop of war Boxer, which terminated in a victory, which, for brilliancy and decision, it is believed, has never been surpassed in single action. The force of the enemy, in this case, was, if not actually superior, at least equal to that of the Enterprise; but the comparative effect of the skill and fire of each proves that, had the enemy been greatly superior in force, the result must have been the same. In this action, the gallant commander of the Enterprise displayed the highest degree of skill and intrepidity, and died in the arms of victory; but being mortally wounded early in the action, was most ably succeeded by Lieutenant McCall, whose conduct on that occasion it is impossible to appreciate too highly.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. JONES.

HON. JOHN GAILLARD,

Chairman Naval Committee.

U. S. BRIG NIAGARA, LAKE ERIE,

September 10, 1813, 4, P. M.

SIR: It has pleased the Almighty to give to the arms of the United States a signal victory over their enemies on this lake.

The British squadron, consisting of two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop, have this moment surrendered to the force under my command, after a sharp conflict.

I have the honor to be, yours, &c.

O. H. PERRY.

HON. WILLIAM JONES,

Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. SCHOONER ARIEL,

Put-in-Bay, Sept. 13, 1813.

SIR: In my last, I informed you that we had captured the enemy's fleet on this lake. I have now the honor to give you the most important particulars of the action.

On the morning of the 10th instant, at sunrise, they were discovered from Put-in-Bay, where I lay at anchor with the squadron under my command. We got under way, the wind light at Southwest, and stood for them. At ten A. M. the wind hauled to Southeast and brought us to windward; formed the line, and bore up. At fifteen minutes before twelve, the enemy commenced firing; at five minutes before twelve, the action commenced on our part. Finding their fire very destructive, owing to their long guns, and its being mostly directed at the Lawrence, I made sail, and directed the other vessels to follow, for the purpose of closing with the enemy. Every brace and bowline being soon shot away, she became unmanageable, notwithstanding the great exertions of the sailingmaster. In this situation, she sustained the action upwards of two hours, within canister distance, until every gun was rendered useless, and the greater part of her crew either killed or wounded. Finding she could no longer annoy the enemy, I left her in charge of Lieutenant Yarnall, who, I was convinced, from the bravery already displayed by him, would do what would comport with the honor of the flag. At half past two, the wind springing up, Captain Elliott was enabled to bring his vessel, the Niagara, gallantly into close action. I immediately went on board of her, when he anticipated my wishes, by volunteering to bring the schooners, which had been kept astern by the lightness of the wind, into closer action. It was with unspeakable pain that I saw, soon after I got on board the Niagara, the flag of the Lawrence come down; although I was perfectly sensible that she had been defended to the last, and that, to have continued to make a show of resistance would have been a wanton sacrifice of the remains of her brave crew. But the enemy was not able to take possession of her, and circumstances soon permitted her flag again to be hoisted. At forty-five minutes past two the signal was made for "closer action." The Niagara being very little injured, I determined to pass through the enemy's line; bore up, and passed ahead of their two ships and a brig, giving a raking fire to them, from the starboard guns, and to a large schooner and sloop from the larboard side, at half pistol shot distance. The smaller vessels, at this time, having got within grape and canister distance, under the direction of Captain Elliott, and keeping up a well directed fire, the two ships, a brig, and schooner, surrendered, a schooner and sloop making a vain attempt to escape.

Capture of the British Fleet on Lake Erie and Brig Boxer.

Those officers and men who were immediately under my observation, evinced the greatest gallantry; and I have no doubt that all others conducted themselves as became American officers and seamen.

Lieutenant Yarnall, first of the Lawrence, although several times wounded, refused to quit the deck.

Midshipman Forrest, (doing duty as lieutenant,) and Sailingmaster Taylor, were of great assistance to me.

I have great pain in stating to you the death of Lieutenant Brooks of the marines, and Midshipman Laub, both of the Lawrence, and Midshipman John Clark, of the Scorpion; they were valuable and promising officers.

Mr. Hambleton, purser, who volunteered his services on deck, was severely wounded, late in the action; Midshipmen Claxton and Swartwout, of the Lawrence, were severely wounded.

On board the Niagara, Lieutenants Smith and Edwards, and Midshipman Webster, (doing duty as sailingmaster,) behaved in a very handsome manner.

Captain Brevoost, of the army, who acted as a volunteer, in the capacity of a marine officer, on board that vessel, is an excellent and brave officer, and with his musketry did great execution.

Lieutenant Turner, commanding the Caledonia, brought that vessel into action in the most able manner, and is an officer that, in all situations, may be relied on.

The Ariel, Lieutenant Packet, and Scorpion, Sailingmaster Champlin, were enabled to get early into action, and were of great service.

Captain Elliott speaks in the highest terms of Mr. Magrath, purser, who had been despatched in a boat on service, previous to my getting on board the Niagara; and being a seaman, since the action has rendered essential service in taking charge of one of the prizes.

Of Captain Elliott, already so well known to the Government, it would almost be superfluous to speak. In this action he evinced his characteristic bravery and judgment; and, since the close of the action, has given me the most able and essential assistance.

I have the honor to enclose you a return of the killed and wounded, together with a statement of the relative force of the squadrons. The captain and first lieutenant of the Queen Charlotte, and first lieutenant of the Detroit, were killed; Captain Barclay, senior officer, and the commander of the Lady Prevost, severely wounded. The commanders of the Hunter and Chipewa, slightly wounded.

Their loss in killed and wounded I have not yet been able to ascertain; it must, however, have been very great.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

O. H. PERRY.

Majesty's brig Boxer, of considerable superiority of force. Nothing that I can say would add to the lustre of the gallant action, which so decidedly speaks for itself. But I cannot restrain my deep regret for the loss of so valuable an officer as the brave Lieutenant Burrows.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

HON. WILLIAM JONES,
Secretary of the Navy.

PORTLAND, September 7, 1813.

SIR: I had the honor last evening to forward you by express, through the hands of Commodore Bainbridge, a letter received from Samuel Storer, Esq., Navy Agent at this place, detailing an account of the capture of the British brig Boxer by the United States' brig Enterprise.

I now have to inform you that I left Portsmouth this morning, and have this moment arrived here, and as the mail is closing, I have only time to enclose you the report of Lieutenant McCall, of the Enterprise, and to assure you that a statement of the two vessels, as to the damage they have received, &c., shall be forwarded as soon as surveys can be made; the Boxer has received much damage in her hull, masts, and sails; indeed it was with difficulty that she could be kept afloat to get her in. The Enterprise is only injured in her masts and sails.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ISAAC HULL.

HON. WILLIAM JONES,
Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES' BRIG ENTERPRISE,
Portland, September 7, 1813.

SIR: In consequence of the unfortunate death of Lieutenant Commander William Burrows, late commander of this vessel, it devolves on me to acquaint you with the result of our cruise.

After sailing from Portsmouth on the 1st instant, we steered to the eastward, and on the morning of the 3d, off Wood Island, discovered a schooner, which we chased into this harbor, where we anchored.

On the morning of the 4th, weighed anchor, and swept out and continued our course to the eastward. Having received information of several privateers being off Monhegan, we stood for that place; and on the following morning, in the bay near Pemequid Point, discovered a brig getting under way, which appeared to be a vessel of war, and to which we immediately gave chase. She fired several guns and stood for us, having four ensigns hoisted. After reconnoitring and discovering her force, and the nation to which she belonged, we hauled upon a wind to stand out of the bay, and at 3 o'clock shortened sail, tacked, and ran down with an intention to bring her to close action.

At twenty minutes after 3 P. M., when, within half pistol shot, the firing commenced from both, and after being warmly kept up, and with some manœuvring, the enemy hailed, and said they had surrendered, about 4 P. M. Their colors being nailed to the masts could not be hauled down. She proved to be His Britannic Majesty's late brig Boxer, of fourteen guns, Samuel Blythe, Esq., commander, who fell in the early part of the engagement, having received a cannon shot through the body. And I am sorry to add that Lieutenant Burrows, who had gallantly led us to action, fell also about the same time, by a musket ball which terminated his existence in eight hours.

The Enterprise suffered much in spars and rigging, and the Boxer, both in spars, rigging, and hull, having many shot between wind and water.

It would be doing injustice to the merit of Mr. Tillinghast, second Lieutenant, were I not to mention the able assistance I received from him during the remainder of the engagement, by his strict attention to his own division and other departments. And the officers and crew, generally, I am happy to add, from their cool and determined conduct, have my warmest approbation and applause.

As no muster roll that can be fully relied on has come into my possession, I cannot exactly state the number killed on board the Boxer; but from information received from the officers of that vessel, it appears there were between twenty and thirty-five killed, and fourteen wounded. Enclosed is a list of the killed and wounded on board the Enterprise.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

REMISSION OF PENALTIES AND FORFEITURES.

[Communicated to the House, June 16, 1813.]

The Acting Secretary of the Treasury, to whom was referred the memorial of Stephen Girard and others, owners of the ships Good Friends, United States, and Amazon, and their cargoes, respectfully reports:

Remission of Penalties and Forfeitures.

That the above named vessels, with their cargoes, consisting of merchandise of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain, having left ports in Great Britain in the months of October and December, 1811, arrived at Amelia Island, in East Florida, between the 22d of December, 1811, and the 10th of February, 1812, and were lying in the port of Fernandina, in that island, on the 18th of March, 1812, on which day possession was taken of the island by George Mathews, under a pretended authority from the Government of the United States. Under the same authority, a local government was established by him, and such officers appointed as he deemed necessary to administer it. The supercargoes and agents for the property on board the vessels in question, deeming their situation insecure, and that the value of the cargoes would probably invite hostile or predatory attacks upon them if they remained in a port where, within three days, the public authority had been exercised under no less than three different jurisdictions, and considering themselves as already, without their own agency or consent, placed, with the property in their charge, under the authority of the United States, applied to General Mathews for permission to proceed to Philadelphia, under such conditions and restrictions as might secure the property from the penalties and forfeitures to which, by the then existing laws of the United States, it would be exposed if imported into the United States. General Mathews granted this request, considering, as he himself expressed it, "that the vessels and their cargoes were already under the protection of the flag of the United States, and within the waters of an integral part of our common country;" and that they would not therefore be subjected, by going to Philadelphia, to the prohibitions of the non-importation law. He directed that the vessels and cargoes should be delivered in charge to the collector of Philadelphia, should so remain until the determination of the Government in relation to them should be known, and took bonds for the performance of this condition. The vessels left Amelia Island on the 10th of April, 1811, and arrived in the river Delaware, on their way to Philadelphia, on the 19th day of the same month, when they were seized by the collector of the district of Delaware, and were subsequently libelled in the district court of that district, as liable to forfeiture for an infringement of the non-importation act. The taking possession of Amelia Island by Gen. Mathews, in the manner in which it was done, and his subsequent acts at that place, being altogether unauthorized and illegal, the license, or permission which he gave for the vessels to proceed to Philadelphia was entirely null, and they, with their cargoes, were, of course, on coming within the jurisdiction of the United States, subject to forfeiture.

These are the material facts in the cases represented in the memorial. The grounds on which the memorialists ask for relief, are,

1st. That the lading of the merchandise on board their ships, in the first instance, was without any intention to violate the provisions of the act of March 1st, 1809, commonly called the non-importation act. By the fifth section of that act, the lading of prohibited merchandise on board of any vessel in a foreign country, with an intent to import the same into the United States, is made penal, and subjects the merchandise, and the vessel on board of which it is laden, to forfeiture. But the memorialists represent, that, although the ultimate destination of the merchandise was for the United States, yet, that it was not their intention that it should at any time enter the United States in contravention of the laws; that their property was withdrawn from England in the apprehension of its insecurity there from an approaching state of war; and that it was placed in a situation recommended by its supposed safety, and by its proximity to the United States, to await the time when it might, by an expected act of the Government, be made lawful to introduce it into the United States. The intention of violating the law, which is what the act of March, 1809, must have contemplated when the lading of prohibited merchandise on board a vessel in a foreign country was made criminal, is disowned by the memorialists; and from all the circumstances, particularly in Mr. Girard's case, from the application made by him to Congress, in the month of March, 1812, for permission by law to import the cargo of the ship Good Friends, thereby manifesting his disposition to respect the laws, and to avoid, in every particular, their infringement, appears not to have been entertained by them.

2d. That the importation, when actually made, was supposed by the memorialists and by their agents not to be illegal. The powers which Gen. Mathews assumed to possess at Amelia Island, could not, from the nature of the case, be investigated by the agents of the memorialists there present. He pretended to have authority for what he did; and exterior circumstances may, in some measure, have justified a belief, on their part, that his acts were directed, and would be sanctioned, by the Government. The vessels and their cargoes, on their arrival in Philadelphia, were to be put in possession of the collector of the customs, and no intention of a clandestine or fraudulent introduction of any part of the merchandise can be supposed to have been entertained in the remotest manner by the memorialists.

Under these views of the cases of the memorialists, they would appear to be entitled to relief. The consideration that Congress has, by three acts, passed at their last session, directed the penalties and forfeitures incurred under the same prohibitory act, by three classes of importers of British merchandise, to be remitted, strengthens and confirms this idea. But it must be recollected that several cases of importations from Amelia Island, under circumstances similar to those stated in the present memorial, have already occurred and been acted on. Petitions for remission having been presented to the Secretary of the Treasury, they were granted under the authority of the general mitigating act of March, 1797, upon certain conditions, the effect of which was, to subject the merchandise to the payment of the double duties imposed by the act of July 1, 1812; and this upon the ground that, as the merchandise could not be legally admitted to entry till the remission took place, and as this was not granted till after the act of July 1, 1812, was in operation, it was equally consistent with equity, and with the law then in force, that the double duties should be made to attach to the merchandise. The principles which governed in those decisions were stated in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the 1st of February last, of which a copy is annexed to this report. Those principles were sanctioned by the Committee of Ways and Means, and are understood to have been concurred in by the House. The same measure of justice or of indulgence is due to all those standing in the same situation; and it is respectfully suggested that the relief prayed for by the memorialists in the present case should be granted only on the payment of the double duties imposed by the act of July 1, 1812; or, in other words, on the payment of such duties as would be payable on the merchandise if imported at the time when the act by which the importation already made is legalized, shall be passed.

All which is respectfully submitted,

W. JONES,

Acting Sec'y of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

June 15th, 1813.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled :

The memorial of Stephen Girard, of the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, merchant, owner of the ship Good Friends, and her cargo; Thomson and Morris, of the same place, merchants, owners of the ship Amazon, and of part of her cargo; Bryan & Schlatter, Edward Wilson, Longstreth & Wilson, William S. Crothers, and John Vaughan, the legal representatives of Samuel Merrik, lately deceased, all of the same place, merchants, also respectively part owners of the cargo of the said ship Amazon; Luke Tiernan & Co., Henry Shroeder and Co., and Levin Wetherill, of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, merchants, also respectively part owners of the cargo of the said ship Amazon; and Jonathan Ogden, of the city of New York, merchant, also part owner of the cargo of the said ship Amazon; and Rugan & Rhodes, of the city of Philadelphia, merchants, owners of the ship United States, and her cargo, respectfully sheweth :

That your memorialist, Stephen Girard, represented to Congress, at their session in March, 1812, the circumstances under which his ship the Good Friends, Robert Thompson, master, with a value cargo of the manufactures of England, (belonging also to him,) had proceeded from London to Amelia Island; and prayed, in contemplation of the impending war between the United States and Great Britain, that he might be permitted to rescue his property from the danger to which it was exposed, by placing it, upon any terms that the wisdom of the Legislature should prescribe, within the protection of the United States; as will more particularly appear by a copy of the representation annexed to the present memorial, A.

That your memorialists, the owners of the ships Amazon and the United States, and of their respective cargoes, influenced by motives similar to those which had actuated Mr. Girard, also removed their property from the immediate jurisdiction and power of the British Government, and sent it to Amelia Island, as a situation of comparative safety, in the event of war. But, reposing perfect confidence in the impartiality, as well as in the liberality of Congress, they abstained from addressing your honorable body on the occasion; since the principle of your decision on Mr. Girard's memorial, would naturally be applied to all cases within the same reason for indulgence and relief. The ship Amazon sailed from Liverpool about the fourth of October, 1811, and arrived at Amelia Island about the 22d of December following. The ship United States sailed from Liverpool about the 25th of October, 1811, and arrived at Amelia Island about the 25th of December following.

That your memorialists, while the attention of Congress is again claimed upon this interesting subject, deem it proper, solemnly and explicitly to declare, that, although they were desirous to withdraw their respective funds from England, and to reap the emolument of a fair trade in the goods which they had respectively ordered, yet that they never did intend to make the shipments in England, or to import the goods into any district of the United States, in violation of the laws of their country. True it is, that, at the time of the shipments, your memorialists anticipated, either as a consequence of an adjustment of the differences subsisting between the United States and Great Britain, or as a consequence of a formal declaration of war, that an importation would, eventually, be rendered lawful; but they utterly deny that the shipments were made with a view to an importation, in peace or in war, at any period of time, or under any change of circumstances, without the direct and positive sanction of the American Government.

That, in connexion, however, with this declaration, your memorialists respectfully remark, that notwithstanding the existence of the non-importation act, the citizens of the United States might lawfully transport their property, consisting of British products or fabrics, from one British port to another; or from a British port to the ports of any other foreign nation; and an ulterior design to bring the property to their own home, whenever that course might also be lawfully pursued, has never been denounced, and can never be justly denounced, as a subject for prosecution and punishment: for, if upon a rigid interpretation of a doubtful expression, it has been alleged that a penalty is incurred, by the act of putting goods of British growth or manufacture, on board of any ship or vessel, with intention of importing them into the United States, "against the prohibition or the true intent and meaning of the law," even before the goods have been brought within the jurisdiction of the United States, yet neither the spirit nor the language of the law can ever be so strained as to affix the same penalty to the act of putting such goods on board of any ship or vessel, with the qualified, contingent, and avowed intention of importing them, only when, and after, the legislative prohibition had ceased, and the intent and meaning of the law could not possibly be contravened.

That your memorialists having, with these unoffending dispositions, transported their property from England to the port of Fernandina, in Amelia Island, were anxiously but submissively waiting the decision of Congress upon their case, when a political revolution suddenly occurred, which transferred the possession and jurisdiction of the Island from Spain to the United States. It appears, from the public documents of the time, that, in consequence of an insurrection of the neighboring inhabitants, the town of Fernandina surrendered to an armed party, calling themselves "the Patriots," on the 17th of March, 1812; that the Patriots, on the ensuing day, entered into capitulation with General George Mathews, at the head of the land and naval forces of the United States, ceding to him the town, the harbor, and the adjacent country, as the deputed Commissioner of the United States, to receive the cession; and that General Mathews took immediate possession of Fernandina, appointed a judge, a collector, a harbor master, and a notary public; and exercised all the other functions of government, civil and military, in the name and on behalf of the United States.

That your memorialist are aware of the disclosure, at a period long subsequent, of the secret act of Congress, passed on the 15th of January, 1811, authorizing the President, upon the occurrence of certain events, to take possession of the territory lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia, and the Mississippi Territory, of the commission and instructions issued to General Mathews and Colonel McKee, jointly and severally, for carrying the provisions of the act into effect; and of the judgment of the President, that General Mathews, in accepting the cession of Fernandina, under the circumstances which have been stated, transgressed the limits of his commission. But your memorialists, with great deference, observe, that, in a transaction to which the Legislative and Executive Departments of the Government had thus affixed the seal of secrecy and confidence, a knowledge of the law could not be acquired, by the ordinary means of information; and every citizen was obliged, every citizen was bound, to presume the competency and the validity of General Mathews's authority, simply because the authority was exercised. The Commissioner might, therefore, be personally responsible for his conduct; reparation might be come due, as for a violation of the territory and sovereignty of a foreign Power; and individuals, upon the spot, might be involved in losses, for which no indemnity could be obtained: but it will be without precedent, as it is, most manifestly, without principle, that the American Government should take advantage of the honest delusion produced by the public conduct of an accredited agent, acting under color of a secret commission, to entangle its own citizens in the net of legal confiscation.

That, as soon as the revolution of Fernandina appeared to be consummated, by the organization and establishment of a government under the authority of the United States, the masters of the ships, belonging, as before mentioned, to your memorialists, and the supercargoes charged with the care of the goods on board, saw that the danger and the difficulty of their situation were greatly increased, without their participation in the cause. By an act performed in the name, and under the authority of the United States, Amelia Island had become an American possession; the vessels and cargoes of your memorialists, without their intention or knowledge, were subjected to the American jurisdiction; the island no longer remaining a neutral asylum, seemed to present an attitude of defiance towards England, as well as Spain; and the rich accumulation of American property in the harbor of Fernandina, offered so strong a temptation, that any other inducement was scarcely wanting, to insure a predatory visit, under whatever pretext, from some of the belligerent cruisers or privateers. To remain, therefore, at Amelia Island, in this unexpected change of circumstances, was thought a wilful sacrifice of the ships and cargoes. The alternative of seeking another safe and peaceful port, in a foreign country, was thought impracticable: for, no voyage could be undertaken, with a hope of avoiding capture; no insurance could be effected, at any rate of premium; and, after all, what port was open for selection, to which the belligerents, with hostile views, could not also resort? In this dilemma, it was natural, it was proper, that the agents of your memorialists should apply for advice and assistance, to the Commissioner of the United States, whose public conduct (then deemed to be duly authorized) had contributed to embarrass them; and let it be remarked, that, even if they had been disposed rather to place the property of your memorialists within the reach of their own Government, as an object of confiscation, than to expose it to the belligerents, as an object of pillage, the patriotism of the choice might serve, in the most unfavorable result, as some excuse for its imprudence.

But your memorialists further respectfully represent, that their agents, well knowing the nature and obligation of the instructions which they had received, felt no disposition, under any aspect of affairs, to enter the ports of the United States, in violation of the law. Of the authority of General Mathews to accept the cession of Fernandina, upon the terms of the capitulation, they never conceived a doubt; of the Constitutional or legal effect of the cession to identify Amelia Island with the territory of the United States, they never presumed to form an opinion; of the public policy and lawfulness of removing the American property from Amelia Island, they believed General Mathews to be a competent judge; but, still, with respect to all these considerations, they referred their conduct implicitly to the order and guidance of the Commissioner, acting in the name and under the authority of the United States, as will more particularly appear by their address, and his answer, of which copies are annexed to this memorial, B, C.

That from these, and other documents now exhibited, your memorialists are confident that it will be satisfactorily proved to your honorable body, that the ships and cargoes belonging to them, as before stated, were not voluntarily brought by their agents from Amelia Island into the United States, with a design to contravene the prohibition of the act of Congress respecting goods of British growth or manufacture; but that they were sent hither, under an apparently lawful license, upon motives of public policy, in a case of necessity, to be disposed of as the Government should be pleased, eventually, to direct: Thus,

1. The agents of your memorialists, declaring that they did not wish to violate any law, and expressing a belief that General Mathews possessed sufficient powers for the occasion, suggested that permission might be granted to proceed from Amelia Island to Philadelphia, as a place of refuge and safety, under bonds to deliver the ships and cargoes into the hands of the collector, subject to the orders of the President.

2. General Mathews, acting upon a knowledge of his powers, and exercising his own judgment, adopted the suggestion; considering the ships and cargoes to be under the protection of the capitulation, by which Amelia Island was ceded to the United States; considering, on motives of public policy, as well as of private justice, that the large amount of property, at Amelia Island, would be an additional attraction to the belligerents, and, probably, lead to hostilities at that place; considering, that, in consequence of the cession, the vessels and cargoes were under the protection of the flag of the United States, in the waters of an integral part of the common country; and considering that, for these reasons, the ships and cargoes could no longer be subject to the penalty of the non-importation law, upon entering a port of the United States, with the sanction of his license.

3. But, at the moment of issuing the license, bonds were exacted from your memorialists, with a condition, "to produce, to the collector of the district of Amelia Island, within six months, a certificate that the cargoes had been delivered to the collector of Philadelphia, and to remain in his charge until the determination of the Government of the United States should be known;" and, with these bonds, the ships and cargoes sailed, and were actually consigned to the collector of the port of Philadelphia, under the license of a letter, which Governor Mathews addressed to that officer, bearing date the 31st of March, 1812. (D.)

That it is thus manifestly proved, that the ships and cargoes, belonging to your memorialists, as before stated, were sent, for safety, about the 10th of April, 1812, from Amelia Island, into the waters of the United States, under a public license, to be delivered (not to their respective owners, but) to the officers of the Government in the port of Philadelphia; subject (not to the orders of their respective owners, but) to the orders of the President. The ships and cargoes, accordingly, arrived in the Delaware, about the 19th of April, in their passage to the port of Philadelphia; but, notwithstanding the peculiar circumstances under which they arrived, with a fair destination to the port of the owners, for delivery to the collector there, by the order of General Mathews, and, notwithstanding the certain and continued power of the Government over the property, in the port of Philadelphia, as well as elsewhere, within the territory of the United States, the ships and cargoes were seized, upon an alleged breach of the non-importation law, in the district of Delaware, and carried to the port of Wilmington, for trial and adjudication. And, by these proceedings, your memorialists (without indulging the useless language of complaint) have to lament that they are involved in a forfeiture of the bonds which have been given at Amelia Island; that they are deprived of the benefit of the decision of the Government, upon the question of admitting or excluding the ships and cargoes, for refuge and safety, if not for importation and trade; that they have been compelled to obtain a restitution of their property, upon bonds, with sureties, for their respective interests, amounting to the aggregate sum of $645,731 22; of which the interest of one of your memorialists, alone, (Stephen Girard,) amounts to the sum of $303,488 83; that they have been obliged to secure and to pay the duties of tonnage and impost upon their ships and cargoes, (amounting at least to a sum of $94,338 11) even before the fate of the property is ascertained; and, finally, that they are constrained, at a crisis of such public importance, to obtrude upon the time and attention of Congress a respectful, but earnest, solicitation for relief from the prosecution which threatens them.

And here your memorialists rest, with a confidence, which every consideration of the wisdom, the justice, and the impartiality of Congress is calculated to fortify and confirm. They have seen, with sentiments of unqualified approbation, a legislative interposition, to save from ruin of heavy penalties and forfeitures, a class of citizens, who, proceeding upon a sincere, though mistaken anticipation of the alleged revocation of the British Orders in Council, in relation to the American non-importation system, voluntarily and unlawfully sent their vessels, and their cargoes, in a direct voyage from England to the United States. They now present a case, in which an importation into the United States was never contemplated, pending the existence of the non-importation law; in which property has been placed within the jurisdiction of the United States by the force of events beyond the influence and control of its owners; in which the authority of the Government was employed (colorably at least) to produce those events; and in which the ships and cargoes of your memorialists, brought into the waters of the United States, under the license of a public agent, for the purposes of refuge and safety, have been unjustly branded with the offence of an illicit importation for the purposes of trade. Does not the honor of the Government, then, equally with the innocence or the misfortune of your memorialists, seem, in such a case, to demand that the claim of confiscation should be effectually silenced? A court of law may construe the words of the prohibitory act so as to embrace, in its penal dispensations, a contingent and eventual intention, as well as a wilful and direct intention, to import. A judge may regard the defective authority of a public agent as no authority to justify, or excuse, an acquiescence in its exercise. The equitable jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, also, may be deemed inadequate to remit an imputed forfeiture of a nature so complex, and of a magnitude so great. But, in Congress, every power resides to display the honor, the justice, and the liberality of the nation, and to Congress your memorialists definitively appeal.

A.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, the memorial of Stephen Girard, of the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, merchant, respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialist, who has been engaged, for many years, in the prosecution of an extensive commerce, feels pride and pleasure in being able to affirm, that the operations of his personal industry, and pecuniary capital, have not, in any instance, been injurious to his country, nor dishonorable to himself. And at the moment of soliciting your attention for the object of the present memorial, he prays you to believe that he aims not, in any degree, to obstruct the policy of the Government, nor to obtain from legislative favor an indulgence which is incompatible with legislative impartiality.

That your memorialist perceives, in the existing system, prohibiting the importation of British merchandise into the United States, a design to coerce the justice of a foreign Power, through the medium of its interest; but it cannot be presumed that a system, calculated to vindicate the national rights, will be allowed to impair the national resources; or that the means employed to redress the wrongs of an American citizen, shall be rendered the means more completely to impoverish and oppress him.

That, before the prohibitory system was adopted and enforced, there had been intrusted, either directly or circuitously, to the care of British merchants, in Europe, a considerable portion of the commercial capital of the United States, which, upon the adoption of that system, it became obviously the interest of the nation at large, as well as of the individual proprietors, to withdraw. And although the immediate policy of our Government prevented an investment in British products or manufactures, the American capitalists were enabled, for a time, by fortuitous circumstances, to make important returns in the public stock of the United States, and in the stock of the late Bank of the United States, as well as by bills of exchange.

That the efficacy of the prohibitory system has been thought, so far, to require a general restraint; but, upon principle, a clear and satisfactory distinction has always existed, and must forever exist, between the case of the merchant, who seeks to purchase with money, or on credit, British produce and manufactures, for the current purposes of trade, and that of the merchant who is forced into a similar investment, for the sole purpose of bringing home his pecuniary funds, which had previously accumulated in the hands of a foreign agent. In the former case, a new source of encouragement may be opened to the British manufacturer; but, in the latter, the incidental consideration of British profit is lost, while we estimate the more important effect which adds the fruits of American enterprise to the active wealth of the country.

That, connected with these views which the prohibitory system alone presents, your memorialist respectfully submits to the wisdom of Congress the considerations that arise from an approaching war. In contemplation of war, every Government endeavors to preserve the property of its citizens from the grasp of an enemy; and even few treaties are formed, without guarding against the violent effects of a sudden rupture, by an express stipulation, that, in such event, the citizens of the contracting parties inhabiting the territory of each other, shall enjoy a reasonable opportunity to remove themselves and their goods. The prohibitory system prevented the importation of British merchandise into the United States; but the strong and continued indications of an approaching war admonished every American citizen to remove his property, in any practicable mode, to any lawful place of deposit, out of the sphere of British seizure and confiscation. Hence, when it was no longer practicable, in the ordinary modes of remittance, by bills of exchange, or by purchases of American stock, to transfer pecuniary funds from England to America; when gold and silver were scarcely current, and could not be exported; and when the depreciated state even of bank notes, forbade the voluntary acceptance of any payment for a debt, in the paper medium of the Kingdom; the American saw no other prospect, to rescue his fortune from the impending war, than in investment in British merchandise, which, without offending English or American laws, he might transport to an asylum of temporary security, if not of ultimate emolument, in some neutral country.

That, resting his hope upon these general foundations, your memorialist proceeds, with deference and respect, to represent the peculiar circumstances of his own case, in a brief but distinct narrative, which he is ready to verify, with all the formalities of legal evidence. Thus, it has been his course of trade for several years past, to send valuable cargoes, consisting of the produce of the United States, and of the produce and fabric of the East and West Indies, in his own vessels, to the continent of Europe, where, the cargoes being sold, the greater portion of the proceeds of the sales has been invested, from time to time, in Spanish milled dollars, and sent, in the same vessels, to the Isles of France and Bourbon, Java, Madras, Calcutta, and Canton, to procure return cargoes for the port of Philadelphia. The proceeds of sales, which were not thus employed, were remitted to London; but, in the year 1807, when the embarrassments and dangers of neutral commerce had greatly increased, your memorialist deemed it expedient to abandon the scheme of circuitous voyages; his vessels were ordered to return immediately from Europe to America, and his consignees upon the Continent were instructed to remit the whole proceeds of his consignments to Messrs. Baring, Brothers, and Co., of London, for his use. In consequence of these arrangements, it will appear, from a schedule annexed to this memorial, A, that, on the 31st of December, 1808, the balance in favor of your memorialist, in the hands of Messrs. Baring, Brothers, and Co., amounted to £33,681 17s. sterling; that, during the year 1809, the sum of £131,003 5s. 9d. sterling, was remitted from the Continent to the London house; and the sum of £62,042 16s. 8d., was drawn for by your memorialist, leaving, on the 31st of December, 1809, a balance in his favor, amounting to £102,642 6s. 1d. sterling; that, during the year 1810, the sum of £69,600 1s. 11d. sterling, was remitted from the Continent to the London house, and the sum of £45,440 15s. 7d. sterling was drawn for by your memorialist, leaving, on the 31st of December, 1810, a balance in his favor, amounting to £116,771 12s. 5d. sterling; and that, during the year 1811, the sum of £77,794 1s. 4d. sterling, was remitted from the Continent to the London house, finally placing in their hands an aggregate amount of £154,495 13s. 9d. sterling, subject to the orders of your memorialist.

That your memorialist here prays leave to remark, that this accumulation of funds in the hands of the London house did not arise from a course of English trade, nor was it designed for an investment in British merchandise. The fact is, that Messrs. Baring, Brothers, & Co. were constituted the European bankers of your memorialist, and were instructed to make remittances to him in American stock and bank shares. The commencement of the year 1811, however, exhibited a crisis the most alarming. On the one hand, the hope of obtaining satisfactory remittances from England vanished; while, on the other, the prospect of inevitable war seemed to put at hazard the property itself. In this situation, your memorialist determined to close his European transactions, and to collect, at a point nearer to his home, his various pecuniary resources. In the fulfilment of this determination, he employed the proper agents, and the result has been the investment of a part of his funds in American stock, and bank shares; of another part in British merchandise; and still leaving a balance of £40,639 4s. 2d. sterling, in his favor, in the hands of Baring, Brothers, & Co.

That your memorialist, with a more particular view to the relief that he seeks, further represents that the British merchandise thus procured and specified in the statement marked B, having not yet received the original invoices, was shipped on board his vessel called the Good Friends, Robert Thompson, master, which sailed about the 4th of January, 1812, from the port of London, for Amelia Island, Rio Janeiro, and Philadelphia; the last place being mentioned in the clearance, because Captain Thompson had given bond to land certain articles there, viz: three anchors, twenty-five boxes of sheathing copper, and two barrels patent copper sheathing nails, intended for the use of my ships; that the vessel arrived at Amelia Island about the 9th of February, and that she there lies with her cargo, constituting, together, a property amounting, as per statement, to £66,943 19s. 1d. sterling, exposed to tempests and fire, to felonious depredations, and hostile capture.

And now your memorialist, having shown the origin and progress of the present transaction, by which he has rescued his property from the possession of a contemplated enemy, at the eve of a public war, presumes most earnestly, though most respectfully, to hope, that he may be permitted, also, to rescue it from the existing danger, by placing it, upon any terms, within the jurisdiction, and under the protection, of the United States. If, notwithstanding the peculiar circumstances of the case, it shall be deemed inexpedient to admit his vessel and cargo to a general entry, he concludes with praying that they may be admitted to take refuge in the possession of the revenue officers of any port of the United States, until a season of greater safety.

PHILADELPHIA, March 9, 1812.

Explanatory Statement, A.

These several years past, I have been in the habit to ship, on my account, cargoes consisting of produce of the United States, and other articles of India, West India, &c., to the continent of Europe. Those shipments have been disposed of, at their respective destinations, by the consignees; and, in many instances, the greatest part of their proceeds were invested in Spanish milled dollars, &c., and shipped on board of my ships or vessels for the Isles of France and Bourbon, Java, Madras, Calcutta, and Canton, and back to this port. The residue of the net proceeds of the original cargoes was remitted, from time to time, to my London friends, until July, 1807, when the increasing difficulties compelled me to order my ships back direct from said continent of Europe to this port, and to request my consignees to remit my funds to Messrs. Baring, Brothers, & Co., merchants, of London, subject to my order, as it appears by the following statement, viz:

On the 31st of December, 1808, balance in my favor in the hands of the London house £33,681 17s. sterling.

During the year 1809, £131,003 5s. 9d. sterling, were remitted from Amsterdam, &c., to the London house, and my bills, &c., on said house, during that year, amounted to £62,042 16s. 8d.

On the 31st December, 1809, balance in my favor, £102,642, 6s. 1d.

In the year 1810, remittances from the Continent, amounting to £59,500 1s. 11d. sterling, were made on my account, and the amount of my bills, &c., during that year, £45,440 15s. 7d.

Balance in my favor, on 31st December, 1810, £116,701 12s. 5d. sterling.

The remittances made on my account, in the year 1811, by my consignees, on the continent of Europe, to Messrs. Baring, Brothers, & Co., amounted to £77,794 1s. 4d.

The lowness of exchange on England, with the increasing danger and difficulties which our commerce experienced in Europe, together with the apparent gradual depreciation of British sterling bank notes, and the rumors of war between this country and some of the belligerent Powers, rendered me very uneasy, particularly as I had not received those remittances which I had requested my London friends to make me in American stocks and in United States' Bank shares. After meditating on these unfavorable prospects, in July last I decided to liquidate the unsettled business which I had on the continent of Europe, and to draw from there and from England all the funds which I had in those countries. For that purpose, I appointed two confidential agents; one is Mr. Charles N. Bancker, a competent judge of dry goods, whom I furnished with a letter of credit on Messrs. Baring, Brothers, & Co., of London, for £50,000 sterling, to be invested in British manufactures, to be shipped, on my account, on board of my ship Good Friends. The other agent was Mr. Joseph Curwen, a merchant of this city, whom I invested with my general power of attorney to settle all my European business, and to remit me my funds as fast as practicable. That gentleman was also authorized to furnish Mr. Charles N. Bancker with an additional sum of £10,000 sterling, to be also invested in British manufactures, if he should judge advisable.

Mr. Charles N. Bancker went from New York, early in August, 1811, to England, where he attended the business allotted to him. Mr. Joseph Curwen sailed from the river Delaware, on or about the 1st of August last, in my ship Good Friends, Robert Thompson, master, for Lisbon; there attended to the sales of that ship's cargo, consisting of flour; went to Cadiz on business of his own; and from there proceeded to London, where he arrived in October last, superintending my interest, and investing funds, on my account, in American 6 per cent. stock, at 12 per cent. above par, and United States' Bank shares at about £94 10s. per share, to the amount of £153,856 9s. 7d. sterling, including £66,943 19s. 1d. sterling amount of British manufactures selected, purchased, and shipped, on my account, by Mr. Charles N. Bancker, &c., on board of the ship Good Friends, Robert Thompson, master.

On or about the 20th of November last, Mr. Joseph Curwen went from England over to the continent of Europe, for the purpose of settling my concerns at Hamburg, Riga, and Sweden.

Mr. Charles N. Bancker sailed from Portsmouth, England, passenger on board of the ship Good Friends, on the 4th of January last. At his departure from the country, there was still a balance in my favor of £40,639 4s. 2d. sterling in the hands of Messrs. Baring, Brothers, & Co.

The funds which I had, and still have, in England, result altogether out of the proceeds of the shipments on my account, which I have consigned to my agents on the continent of Europe, who, after having sold my goods, have remitted their proceeds to Messrs. Baring, Brothers, & Co.

The foregoing statement of the yearly balance due me by Messrs. Baring, Brothers, & Co., of London, ever since the 31st of December, 1808, may, at all times, be proved by my books; also, by the accounts current which I have received from that house; their correspondence with me; and by the several accounts of sales, accounts current, and letters received from my agents and consignees, of my shipments to said continent of Europe.

The ship Good Friends, Robert Thompson, master, with a cargo of British manufactures, amounting to £66,943 19s. 1d., including three anchors, sheathing copper, copper nails, bunting, and other articles, for the use of my ships, was cleared out in London, for Amelia Island, Rio Janeiro, and Philadelphia. Sailed from England on the 4th of January last, and arrived at Amelia Island on the 9th ultimo. Capt. Robert Thompson having been compelled to give a bond for the landing of the copper and anchors in a port of the United States, is, as I am informed, the cause which has induced the collector of the British customs to insert Philadelphia in the clearance of said ship.

My ship Good Friends and cargo, at Amelia Island, being subject to loss by tempest, fire, capture, &c., I am anxious to secure that valuable property in a place of safety, by being permitted to order said ship, with her cargo, round to this port; here to enter said cargo for exportation, and to have the same landed and stored under the care of the custom-house, except the three anchors, the sheathing copper, and copper nails, a small ball of bunting, four night glasses, with several charts, amounting to £1,563 18s. sterling, which, being intended for the use of my ships, part of them are now wanted for a new ship which I am fitting out.

To General George Mathews, Commissioner of the United States.

We, the undersigned, masters and supercargoes of the following American vessels and their cargoes, viz: the ship United States, of Philadelphia, James Girdon, master, George Rugan, agent for the owners; the ship Amazon, of New York, George R. Turner, master, and agent for consignees and owners; the ship Good Friends, of Philadelphia, Robert Thompson, master, and William Adgate, supercargo; being under great apprehension for the safety of the vessels and property under their charge, are induced thus to offer you a statement of their cases.

The ship United States arrived at Amelia on the 25th of December, 1811, from Liverpool, with a cargo consisting of crates of earthenware and blankets, the property of Rugan and Rhodes, merchants and citizens of the United States, resident in Philadelphia; the ship Amazon arrived at Amelia on the 22d of December, from Liverpool, with a cargo of dry goods belonging to citizens of the United States, residing in Philadelphia. New York, and Baltimore; the ship Good Friends arrived at Amelia on the 10th of February, from London, with a cargo of dry goods belonging to Mr. Stephen Girard, a citizen of the United States, and resident merchant in Philadelphia.

The undersigned beg leave to state that, by reason of the non-importation law, they could not enter the waters of the United States. In consequence of which, they came here to wait until they could be legally admitted; having remained here from the dates above-mentioned, with all their cargoes on board, which will appear by the bills of lading, and other documents, until the late occurrences, which have placed our vessels and property under the protection of the United States. That they are fearful that, in the event of hostilities being commenced, and this being the seat of war, the property may not be safe in its present situation. Not wishing to violate any law, and deeming you authorized, we are induced, for the safety of the property in question, to request permission from you to proceed to the port of Philadelphia, under such conditions and restrictions as shall secure the property from the penalties which might arise out of the existing laws of the United States. Agreeably to your request, we lay before you the amount of the cargoes, as far as they can at present be ascertained, which we suppose will amount in all to about five hundred thousand dollars.

FERNANDINA, March 27, 1812.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your statement, and do not hesitate as to the justice and reason of your request; but wish, for your own interest, as well as for public satisfaction, that the mode may be varied; which may be done without militating against the essential part of your petition.

In your address to me I should prefer, to the present form, your briefly stating the names of the ships, owners, amount of cargo, the port last from, and date they were riding at anchor in these waters, under the protection of the Spanish flag, when, on the 17th instant, the flag was changed by articles of capitulation with the late Patriots of this district, and their flag hoisted; that, in the aforesaid articles, protection is afforded to shipping and merchandise of every description, and that, by the cession of the Patriots of this district, on the 18th, to the United States, through me, as United States' Commissioner, I have, in my official capacity, guaranteed the observance of the capitulation; that, unless my interference is afforded in the way and manner you point out, you expect the consequences you appear to, and I have no doubt really dread for. I fully concur in opinion with you, that the large amount of property here would be an additional incitement to the belligerents to visit this place, and am desirous to remove every source which, in its consequences, might lead to hostilities. I shall, however, require that a schedule of the property removed be given, and that you enter into bonds and security to the President of the United States, that your ships and cargoes shall be under the direction and control of the collectors of the ports to which your ships may be destined, until further orders from the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Government of the United States.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

GEO. MATHEWS.

MESSRS. J. GIRDON, G. RUGAN, G. R. TURNER, R. THOMPSON, and W. WINGATE.

EAST FLORIDA, March 31, 1812.

DEAR SIR: A revolution has lately been effected in East Florida, and the late province, with the exception of the town and citadel of St. Augustine, ceded to the United States by the constituted local authorities, through me, as United States' Commissioner.

Previous to the cession, the ship Good Friends, owned by Stephen Girard, merchant, of Philadelphia, of which Robert Thompson is master, from London, was riding at anchor in the Spanish waters of Amelia river, laden as per manifest enclosed will appear, when, on the 16th instant, the Patriots summoned the town of Fernandina to surrender. It capitulated on the 17th instant, and, on the 18th, the Patriots ceded an extensive district, including the town, waters, and islands, to the United States, through me, as United States' Commissioner. In that capacity, by virtue of powers vested in me, I took possession, with a detachment of United States troops, to hold and defend the same for the United States, stipulating, in my acceptance of the cession, to observe inviolate the articles of capitulation of Fernandina, which affords protection to property of every description—a copy of which has been duly transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States; and, at the same time, I forwarded, with others, a statement of the leading circumstances that relate to this ship and cargo. Having a full conviction that neither the ship nor cargo will be subject to the penalties of the non-importation and non-intercourse laws, in consequence of her entering a port or ports of the United States, I have, for the following reasons and circumstances, thought proper to grant permission for her to proceed to the port of Philadelphia. I consider her now to be under the protection and flag of the United States, and in the waters of an integral part of our common country.

I have taken bond and security for the amount of forty-six thousand six hundred and twenty dollars, that the vessel and the whole of the cargo shall be delivered in charge to the collector of the port of Philadelphia, until the determination of the Government of the United States be known, as relates to her case, and that the ship and cargo shall be subject to the direction of the collector.

Besides the justice of the measure I have adopted, in ordering her a clearance, I think good policy dictates the propriety of the measure at this crisis: for she, with others under exactly, and some under nearly, similar circumstances, would probably, if they remained here, invite the attack of piratical marauders, and perhaps the belligerents, the sooner to make this place the theatre of hostilities.

I am, respectfully, dear sir, yours, &c.,

GEO. MATHEWS.

TO JOHN STEELE,
Collector of the port of Philadelphia.

DIGEST OF MANUFACTURES.

[Communicated to the Senate, January, 15, 1814.]

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, complying with their resolution of the 11th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 15, 1814.

Digest of Manufactures.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 13, 1814.

SIR: In pursuance of the resolution of Congress, of the 19th of March, 1812, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ a person to digest, and reduce to such form as shall be most conducive to the interests of the United States, a statement of the number, nature, extent, situation, and value of the arts and manufactures of the United States, &c., Tench Coxe, Esq., of Philadelphia, was employed for that purpose. I have now the honor to transmit, for the use of the Senate, two series of tables, as prepared by him, exhibiting the several manufactures of the United States, as returned by the marshals, and secretaries of Territories, and their assistants, in the year 1810, first by States and Territories, and secondly, in every county in the Union.

These tables are accompanied by two essays, or collections of facts and observations, prepared also by Mr. Coxe, relating to the state of the manufactures of this country, and the motives which exist for affording encouragement and extension to them. I have the honor to be, &c.

W. JONES,

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the PRESIDENT of the U. S.

PHILADELPHIA, June 21, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you the required copies of the statement of the arts and manufactures of the United States, which it has been my endeavor to render as correct, and as plain and conformable with the views of the Legislature, as the diversities and deficiencies, in the marshals and territorial secretaries' returns, rendered practicable.

I trust that the submission of the facts in Part I, which relates to manufactures, as connected with the general principles of political economy, and the further submission of the facts in Part II, relating to the proper economy of the arts and trades, both which precede the digest of the returns, will not be deemed useless or improper. Considered as symptoms and as evidences, all pertinent facts appeared to be valuable, as indicating the true state of the body politic, in its various members and operations.

The small variation in the form of the statements, which was prepared in the beginning of last December, and the addition of the county returns, involved a transcription of the whole, and much additional clerkship, and have delayed the document until this time. The present form and substance are the best in which it has been in my power to present the authentic or official materials. The entire portion of the work, which is of the nature of estimate, is exhibited separately from the digest of the returns of the marshals and territorial secretaries, in order that neither might obscure or injure, and that each might contribute to illuminate and support the other.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TENCH COXE.

WILLIAM JONES, Esq.

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.A Statement of the Arts and Manufactures of the United States of America, exhibiting

I. A collection of facts, evincing their benefactions to agriculture, commerce, navigation, and the fisheries, and their subserviency to the public defence, with an indication of certain existing modes of conducting them, peculiarly important to the United States.

II. A collection of additional facts, tending to show the practical foundations, actual progress, condition, and establishment, of the American arts and manufactures, and their connexion with the wealth and strength of the United States.

III. A series of tables of the several branches of American manufactures, exhibiting them by States, Territories, and Districts, so far as they are returned in the reports of the marshals, and of the secretaries of the Territories, and their respective assistants, in the Autumn of the year 1810, together with similar returns of certain doubtful goods for productions of the soil, and agricultural stock, as far as they have been received.

IV. A series of tables of the several branches of American manufactures, exhibiting them in every county of the Union, so far as they were returned in the reports of the marshals, and of the secretaries of the Territories, and their respective assistants, in the Autumn of the year 1810, in execution of an instruction of Albert Gallatin, Esq. Secretary of the Treasury, given by him in obedience to a resolution of the Congress of the United States, of the 19th day of March, 1812.

PART I.

A collection of facts, evincing the benefactions of the Arts and Manufactures to Agriculture, Commerce, Navigation, and the Fisheries, and their subserviency to the public defence, with an indication of certain existing modes of conducting them, peculiarly important to the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, December 8, 1812.

SIR: I have already had the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th day of June last, committing to me the preparation of a statement of the arts and manufactures of the United States, in pursuance of the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, approved by the President on the 19th day of March, 1812.

The resolution of Congress is framed with a view so comprehensive, as to include all pertinent information of an authentic character, while it allows the most convenient latitude as to the form and manner; requiring, only, that the statements shall so exhibit the matter, as to be most conducive to the interests of the United States. As the tables, which will comprise the whole mass of the returns of the marshals, will exhibit many genuine parts of the entire body of our manufactures, as they existed in the year 1810, it appeared expedient that they should be preceded by certain fundamental and relative facts, which may contribute more fully to display the objects of investigation, in their bases, commencement, progress, and actual situation, and facilitate public and private measures in this branch of the national industry, and in other branches, to which manufactures have a great and permanent relation.

As some of the facts are of a nature favorable to the landed interest, as some of them are beneficial to foreign commerce, and some of them are advantageous to the business of the fisheries, it is deemed most convenient, in this part of the exposition, to class them under those three several heads and relations. It has also appeared proper, separately and distinctly to present, in this first part, another class of facts, which shows the connexion of manufactures with the public defence.

It is considered as a very interesting and fundamental truth, that manufactures facilitate the first struggles of the American settlers for decent comforts, thrifty profits, and farming establishment.

For the purpose of effectually testing the correctness of this allegation, two measures have been adopted. The first of these measures is an examination into the state of manufactures, in four several sparsely settled districts of our country, which, in 1810, had been recently laid out, according to the nature of the places, for future establishments as counties. The inconsiderable population, within these four intended counties, exhibits the infantine condition of their respective settlements, in that year.

A note of the persons of both sexes, within four of the districts of Pennsylvania, intended to be organized as counties, when sufficiently populated, and of the stock of animals, producing materials for manufactures, with the implements, &c., for the operations of manufactures, and the goods made in the year 1810, so far as they are returned by the Marshal's assistants.

In these new and widely scattered settlements, where foreign consumers have yet no agents, the mere presence of a few sheep and cattle, supplying wool, hides, skins, and horns, and tallow and other fat, as materials for manufacture, (that is to say, the presence of the raw materials,) occasions the corresponding manufactures. In such places, profit, comfort, and necessity, appear to invite, or rather to compel, the farmers and their families to that mode of industry. The returns of the assistant officers, necessarily everywhere defective in this first experiment, must be extremely imperfect in settlements so widely separated. Carriage makers, blacksmiths, hatters, shoemakers, tailors, domestic makers of garments, and other manufacturers, known to exist among recent improvers and in old establishments, are omitted, or did not appear to the officers. Boards, pot ashes, and maple sugar, are also omitted by the marshal or his assistants. It is observed, that the surplus industry of these new settlements is applied to the manufacture of cotton from the Atlantic or the Mississippi. The second measure of examination, to ascertain that manufactures commence with our first settlements, and aid their progress in its earliest stages, relates to the interior State of Ohio, the youngest member of the Union in 1810. It will be remembered, that a number of the Revolutionary officers and soldiers commenced the settlement of that State, originally a part of the Northwestern Territory, soon after the peace of 1783; that the French settlement at Sciota was made a few years later; and that these were followed by the settlements of emigrants from various States, and particularly, of a great number, who improved the tract on Lake Erie, granted to Connecticut. The settlements in the State of Ohio were very much retarded and confined by the detention of the western posts and by the Indians, till after the victory of the Miami, under General Wayne, in the year 1794. Within the fourteen years which preceded the taking of these accounts of manufactures, in the Autumn of 1810, the settlements in the State of Ohio were principally commenced. Its whole population, according to the census of that year, was 230,760 persons, whose comfortable condition and prosperous agriculture were occasioned, maintained, and manifested, by a number of manufactures, of which, and of the connected instruments and machinery for which, the following is the imperfect official summary:

The whole number of looms in the State, actually returned is, 10,856—1,943,433 yards of linen, woollen, and cotton goods, &c. - $999,538

Considerable as this amount is, the important fact will not escape notice, that shoes, boots, saddles, bridles, harness, fur and wool hats, common smiths' work, knit stockings, the making of garments in shops and families, manufactures of wood, soap, candles, pot ash, wares of metal, (exception,) watches and clocks, and various other things, actually made, are omitted. To subject the raw materials of the State of Ohio, wrought into these manufactures, to the expenses of transportation to the Atlantic ports of Canada, or the United States, and to import such substantial, large, and heavy supplies from the usual ports of Europe and Asia, and to transport them into those interior settlements, would discourage or deter all new migrators towards that young State; and would involve its present population in much distress, if not in ruin. The domestic manufacture of cotton appears in counties of Ohio which do not produce that raw material.

In further evidence of the favorable effects of manufactures upon our interior settlements, those of the county of Washington, on the western boundary of Pennsylvania, may be correctly adduced. Its whole population, in 1810, was 36,289 persons. Its sheep, more numerous than those returned by any other county in the State, were 47,206. Its spinning wheels, 8,763. Its looms, much the greater part of which are supposed to be worked by male weavers, regularly in the trade, 1,774. Its hand cards, 4,115 pairs. Its carding machines, 6. Fulling mills, 12. Distilleries, 301. Blacksmiths' shops, 146. Hatters' 20. Saddlers' 19. Shoes and boots, 37,000 pairs. Coopers, 62. The yards of goods made, 570,773; and bricks, 913,000. These, with the goods made in its oil mills, saw mills, powder mills, tanneries, and other manufactures and works, exhibit a value of goods, exclusively of flour, of $1,630,000. As the boroughs, towns, and villages, of Washington, in Pennsylvania, do not contain more than a twentieth of its population, the benefits of manufactures, when conveniently or closely adjacent to agriculture and the landed interest, are clearly displayed. Tracing this case to a national result, it will be found, that the whole population of the United States, in 1810, combining agriculture, the productions of nature, and manufactures, with the same success, would have exhibited an aggregate value of manufactured goods, nearly amounting to three hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars.* The quantity of the manufactured meal of Washington is greater than that of any other county of Pennsylvania. Its number of horses is greater than that of any other, one excepted. Its number of neat cattle is greater than that of any other, except four. It has not one open or worked mine of any metal, nor a furnace, nor a forge, on the return of the marshal.

Pursuing the current of facts from this Western scene to the banks of the Susquehannah and Schuylkill, it is found, that the counties of Lancaster and Berks, with a joint population of ninety-seven thousand and seventy-three persons, manufactured an aggregate value, including flour, of $5,055,000. Twelve other counties of the same State, from the head of the Ohio river, to the banks and county of Delaware, respectively, exhibit similar manufactures, exceeding, on a medium, one million of dollars. The manufactures of the limited but swarming county of Philadelphia, exclusively of the incorporated or city part of the entire town, and deducting all the flour and meal, amount to $6,070,652. The manufactures of the city of Philadelphia, within the strict chartered limits, (not including any of the suburbs or liberties,) containing, on twelve acres of land, 53,722 persons, amount to $9,347,767. The manufactures of Pennsylvania, on twenty millions of acres of her settled lands, including her flour and meal,* and other doubtful articles, appear, by the return of the marshal, to amount to $44,292,093. This return is considered by that officer, and his most intelligent assistants, to be very considerably defective. It has been selected, however, for the preceding exhibition, because, in combination with the return of Ohio, it displays the state of manufactures through an extent of country exceeding fifty millions of acres, commencing at the distance of 530 miles west of Philadelphia, where its very recent settlements are interspersed with Indian cabins, and terminating in the Southeast with a great emporium of manufactures, navigation, domestic trade, and foreign commerce. A vast redundancy of land exists in this middle district; for the total population of Ohio and Pennsylvania, in 1810, was 1,048,808 persons, upon one-fifth of their joint soil. But this redundancy of land is accompanied by abundance of mill seats, of fossil and wood fuel, of mineral and calcareous substances, of bark, dye-woods, sugar trees, clay, marble, building timber, and other natural raw materials, ingredients, and necessities for the manufactures. This redundancy of land also furnishes, upon the cheapest terms, all that belongs to sites for the establishments of the operators, and for the farms of the growers of the raw materials. Hence, we find the sheep of Pennsylvania nearly 619,000; her neat cattle more than 612,000; her horses 255,000; her flour and meal, and grain liquors, worth more than fifteen millions of dollars. Her manufactures of iron and leather, nearly eleven millions in their joint amount. These facts, from the most considerable return, are respectfully adduced and rendered prominent, in order to evidence, by the relative truths, the actual and substantial benefits of manufactures, adjacent to agriculture, in our half settled districts.

The State of Vermont, though its straggling settlements were commenced under numerous disadvantages, but a few years before the Revolution, presents a body of manufactures, almost exclusively from its own productions, of $4,325,-

*Pinkerton, in one edition, states the total value of the manufactures of England at 63,200,000 pounds sterling, about 280,000,000 of dollars. In another edition he states them at 67,200,000 pounds sterling. They exclude some things, which we include.

*The flour and meal are worth, by the marshal's report, 10,800,290 dollars. The unsettled lands of Pennsylvania are supposed to amount to nearly 8,000,000 acres.

824, effected by a population, on farms, in hamlets, and in villages, of no more than 217,805 persons. Its spinning-wheels, more than one-half of which are for wool, the most numerous in proportion on the returns, are 67,756; its looms 14,801; its carding machines, 139; its woollen goods, 1,207,976 yards; its flaxen goods, 1,859,931 yards; its hats, 96,760; its shoes and boots, 304,282 pairs; its maple sugar, 1,200,000 pounds. Its saddlery is valued at $127,840; its tanneries, at $386,500; its iron foundries, tilt hammers, and forges, are 104; its oil mills, 26; its paper mills, 11; its fulling mills, 166; and its naileries, 67. The goods made in its smiths' shops, printing offices, and pot-ash works, and by its bookbinders, brush makers, carriage makers, tallow chandlers, and soap boilers, coopers, clock and watch makers, copper smiths, tin-plate workers, silver-smiths, and other existing manufacturers, are omitted in the return. They are certainly very considerable in value.

The State of Kentucky, a recent establishment, and much later than Vermont, exhibits, on her return, $4,120,683, and Maine, with nearly as much land as the rest of the Eastern States, drawn, of course, from manufactures by agriculture, and by commerce, navigation, and the fisheries, returns home-made goods to the value of $2,137,781. In the reports from each of these States, numerous existing branches are entirely unnoticed. Similar omissions, great and evident, appear in many instances. But a very impressive fact, evincing the real and natural connexion between the planting and farming citizens, and the manufacturing branch of the national industry, is the possession and employment of about 122,719 looms by Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Tennessee, which differ little from six-sixteenths of the whole number of looms in the United States. It appears, that, in the South, the presence of the various raw materials, and still more the great redundancy of cotton, have excited innumerable and valuable manufactures. It is believed that it is to the excitement produced by the presence of the finest marbles, more than to a peculiar eminence of genius, that the Greeks and Romans owe their possession of the beautiful and the grand fabrications from those materials. The invention of statuary occurred in Egypt, but it did not rise to any perfection, in a country destitute of fine marble.

It is a fact of great importance in this statement, and on the subject of the relation of manufactures to the landed interest, that none of its productions, whether of natural growth or the fruits of cultivation, in the Middle, Northern, and Eastern States, which can be considered as raw materials, are now exported, in an unmanufactured state, to foreign markets. The manufacturers may be said to purchase and employ a quantity equal to the whole; for, if small parcels have been lately exported, much greater quantities of similar foreign articles have been introduced from abroad. The landed interests have no actual foreign purchasers for their wool, flax, hemp, hides, and skins of domestic animals, and various metals. The tables compiled from the marshals' returns, will display a very great value and variety of goods, made of those materials, and the returns of imports, and other documents, justify the allegation, that importations of similar foreign materials, to the amount of forty or fifty millions of pounds weight, for the purpose of manufacture, were made in each of several years preceding the season of the returns. The momentous fact is, therefore, satisfactorily established, that the American manufacturer's demand has greatly surpassed all the abilities of the planters, farmers, land holders, and miners, to supply those five descriptions of raw materials. In the same situation, all our crude sugars and molasses, produced in Louisiana, if considered as materials for manufacture, are placed, by our refineries and distilleries.

Cotton.—Until the late revolution in the cultivation of cotton, by which it was converted, through the strenuous exertions of the friends of manufactures, from a petty object, in little fields and gardens, into an article of extensive cultivation among the planters and farmers, there was no redundant raw material for the manufacture of cloths and stuffs for apparel and furniture in the United States. There is, at this time, no other redundant raw material.

The green seed cotton was the best adapted to the general quality and situation, and to the climate of the Southern States. But, its easy cultivation was very much restrained by the extraordinary difficulty of separating it from the seeds. This operation required so much manual industry as greatly to impede the manufacture, and of course, for the time, to prevent an extensive cultivation. In the year 1793, the invaluable saw gin was invented by a citizen of the United States, and was so improved and perfected as to render it easy, it is said, to separate the seeds from one hundred millions of pounds weight of cotton wool, by the employment of three or four hundred persons, although it is alleged that it would require three hundred thousand persons to effect the same by hand. The inventor of this gin states the difference between its operation in common hands, and the ordinary manual operation, at one thousand to one. By the employment of this machinery, every vicinity can, easily and expeditiously, prepare its cotton for the manufacturing cards, and that, in the aggregate, to any extent that the world could require, were it to clothe itself entirely in cotton manufactures. Thus has there been added, by our own invention, to the machinery to facilitate the manufacture of a staple production of our soil, a single improvement, moveable by water, steam, cattle, or hand, which has set loose those immense powers of agriculture, to produce cotton wool, which were before enchained.

In pursuing the statement of facts which manifests the aids of manufactures to the landed interest, the next step, from the American saw gin, is, to the system of machinery, to make cotton yarn.

The water-spinners of cotton, in one of the States, have represented to the marshal that th e can make eighty-two pounds and one half of yarn, by each spindle, within every year. But the owners of other spinning mills deem it unsafe to calculate on more than fifty-two pounds of yarn, per annum, for each spindle. The quality of the yarn under consideration is said to be suitable for cotton cloth of twenty-seven inches in width, worth forty cents per yard. At the lowest of the rates, the United States, had they 1,160,000 spindles, could work up into yarn, the sixty-four millions of pounds weight of cotton, which are the maximum of our exportation in any one year. In a proportion, corresponding with the table in page 10 of your report in part, on the subject of manufactures, this number of spindles would require a capital of nearly seventy millions of dollars. But this would be as well in real estate as in the cash, and other personal property, and loans, and purchases on credit. Sixty-four millions of pounds of cotton, in the proportion of the same table, in page 10, would produce about fifty millions of pounds of cotton yarn, and with the labor, in the proportion of the same table, of about 58,000 persons. Of these, no more than one eighth part ought to be adult males; the remaining seven-eighths might be women and children. This employment of less than a hundredth part of our white population would be no inconvenience to agriculture or commerce. As the cotton spinning mills are increased in magnitude, a smaller proportion of capital will be required.

The yarn thus manufactured, at a price twelve and a half per cent. less than that in the table of the report, page 10, (which appears to be one dollar and one-eighth per pound,) would amount to fifty millions of dollars—a sum exceeding the average value of all the exports of American articles, in the three most favorable years. This great production is from the water and steam manufactory of the exportable surplus of a cotton crop, worth, at twelve and one half cents per pound, eight millions of dollars.*

But, if the weaving of this yarn be executed, as it may be, with perfect ease, by the employment of 100,000 women, (less than one-sixth of our adult females,) with the fly shuttle, during one-half of each working day in the year, the quantity of cloth, by the Rhode Island rule, of four yards for every pound, would amount to about two hundred millions of yards. This quantity of cotton cloth, at one-third of a dollar per yard, would be worth about sixty-seven millions of dollars.

There is yet another operation, which can be effected by labor-saving means, and by a process superseding the labor of many hands. Machinery is now in actual operation, in the United States,

* Cotton yarn, of No. 73, was worth, in England, A. D. 1787, 36s. 6d. sterling, or $8 11 per pound. Such yarn, in 1792, was reduced to 9s. 8½d. sterling, or $2 16 per pound. In 1807, the same No. 73 was worth 4s. 4½d. sterling, or 97 cents per pound. Cotton machinery was not generally extended, in Great Britain, till the year 1780, when it continued under a monopoly. We had not begun to raise cotton crops for exportation, nor invented the saw gin.

for printing cotton and linen cloths, by engraved rollers of copper, moved by water. Ten thousand yards have been printed with ease in a single day, by one man and two boys, with these rollers. Fifty thousand children's handkerchiefs have been printed in the same time by the same number of persons. Similar means are in constant use for staining or dyeing cotton and linen cloths of one color, in the same expeditious manner, so as to make them fit for a greater variety of apparel and furniture. Were these operations to be performed upon the whole quantity of cotton goods estimated in this statement, they would add seven or eight millions of dollars to their value, and would require but fifty or sixty thousand men and children. The aggregate value of our surplus cotton, (64,000,000 lbs.,) even when thus simply manufactured by 210,000 persons, would be raised from eight or nine millions of dollars to seventy-five millions of dollars. The total addition to the original value of our cotton crop alone would be at a rate far exceeding the value of our exports of American growth.

To manifest the importance of such operations to the landed interest, it may be safely affirmed that sixty-four millions of pounds weight of clean cotton wool, freed from the seeds, can be produced, on a low average, by half a million of acres of unmanured land. A quantity of cotton wool, equal to all that is now produced by the civilized and uncivilized nations of the world, could be raised on a very small portion of our Southern soil.

Such are the benefits which agriculture and the country at large may derive from the manufacture of our only redundant raw material. The States of Rhode Island and Massachusetts have expelled all doubts about the practicability of the cotton operations. With the smallest territory in the United States, Rhode Island has already attained and introduced into her vicinity* a cotton branch of our manufactures, as valuable as the cotton branch of any country in Europe was, at the time of the formation of our present Constitution.† The neighboring States of Massachusetts and Connecticut quickly followed Rhode Island; and the tables, which are annexed, imperfect as they unavoidably are, manifest the universality and magnitude of the cotton manufacture in 1810. If a very sober prudence shall estimate the value of the water spun and steam spun cotton yarns, at the prices for which they can be imported, without profit, from Europe, there will remain an opportunity for much lucrative business in works, and very great accommodations and savings in private families, especially in the Southern and Western States and districts. This allegation will not be doubted, since the

* Massachusetts is also great in the cotton branch.

† The quantity of cloths and stuffs, for clothing and furniture, which could be made by the United States, in proportion to the population and manufactures of Rhode Island, in 1810, would be 243,000,000 of yards, according to the marshal's return, which he considers as materially defective.

Digest of Manufactures.

State of Georgia, with a white population of one hundred and forty-five thousand four hundred and fourteen persons, manufactured, at the date of the last census, more yards of various cloths and stuffs than Rhode Island. The difference in favor of Georgia was one million five hundred and forty thousand yards. By the proportion of this frontier Southern agricultural State,* the white population of our country might be proved to have been capable of manufacturing, in 1810, assorted cloths and stuffs, of the various raw materials, to the amount of one hundred and seventy-two millions of yards. These facts illustrate the state of manufactures in one of the most agricultural and in one of the least agricultural States, before the recent increase of the port duties upon foreign manufactures, and the voluntary or unforced course, which those two dissimilar States have respectively taken, in manufacturing their cloths and stuffs, for furniture and apparel, out of the various productions of our own lands.

Wool.—The facts which will be presented in evidence of the present influence of the woollen manufacture upon the landed interest are numerous and important.

There does not occur to present recollection any raw material, in which the hand of Providence has made so great a diversity of quality and value, as exists with respect to sheep's wool. Each description has its proper uses and capacities. The climate in which the sheep is brought forth, raised, and maintained, is considered by many as a circumstance of the utmost importance. A standard by which to determine the correspondence of places in all those particulars which constitute climate, appears therefore to be a great desideratum, and is most likely to be found in natural objects. Some vegetable production, of peculiar characteristics, indicating the same degree of temperature, wherever it is found, was presumed to be probably existent. It is believed that, until a more sure and more accurate standard object can be thought of or discovered, the Aurantia Sinensis, or the China or Sweet Orange, may prove an useful natural instrument to ascertain a climaterial correspondence of a line of places, on the European and North American continents, from which we may safely begin to count the minutes and degrees of temperature, at least for agricultural and manufacturing purposes. The vicinities of Lisbon, in the old world, and St. Augustine and New Orleans, in the new, produce this delicate fruit in the highest perfection, and will be considered as justifying the temporary assumption, subject to correction, that the climates of places, in the Atlantic States, correspond in temperature with those of Europe, not being insular, which are nine degrees of latitude more Northern.†

* In the year 1807, Georgia had only one-eighty-fourth part of the tonnage of the ships and vessels of the United States.

† The production of the sugar cane, and of the cotton shrub or tree, in Spain and America, may also be considered.

An application of this guide to the production of wool, in the United States, gives the following results :

The best wool in Great Britain, is in the Western Islands of Scotland, and is very fine. North latitude in Europe 58°—equal in America to 49°.

The next quality is the wool of Herefordshire, England, and is very good. North latitude in Europe 52° 20"—equal in America to 43° 20".

Saxon wool, the best German, very fine. North latitude in Europe 51° 40"—equal in America to 42° 40".

Rousillon, French wool, very fine. North latitude in Europe 42° 50"—equal in America to 33° 50".

Spanish merino wool, from North latitude in Europe 44 to 39°—equal in America from 35 to 30°.

From the very fine quality of the Scottish Western Island wool, (which is said to be from the merino breed of sheep, obtained accidentally so long ago as A. D. 1588,) from the excellency of the Scottish Shetland wool, and from similar qualities of the wool of Saxony and of the ancient wool of Berri, and the modern wool of Rousillon, in France, there is reason to believe that the climates of Europe, capable of producing undegenerate merino sheep, extend considerably beyond and to the North of Spain. But the classification is given here with exactness; and certain fine wools of Denmark and Sweden might be added. If the political disconnexion of France occasioned her not to possess the breed and the pastoral regimen, necessary to the production of the finest description of wool, the perfect freedom of agriculture, and the actual diffusion of all legitimate advantages in every mode of business, in the United States, will soon enable us to ascertain the extent in which we possess the proper Cis-Atlantic latitudes. There appears no reason to doubt that the precise temperatures of the most favorable and most esteemed sheep walks of Spain are to be found within our territory.

It is considered that a dry air is very favorable to the health of sheep, and to the fineness and delicacy of their wool, and it is believed that the United States may entertain a just confidence in the success of their woollen manufacture, from their enjoying an atmosphere of this character. The most successful woollen manufacture in the world, is found in an insular and humid situation. Our success may therefore become superior.

It is considered that no part of our territory is too far South for healthful sheep and fine wool. This fact is worthy of particular estimation, because it has been erroneously suggested, that the tropical climates convert the fleeces of sheep into hair. Since St. Augustine is of the temperature of Lisbon, our territory on the Gulf of Mexico must be more cool than the South of Spain, Barbary, the South of Italy, Greece, Egypt, the land of Canaan, and the greater part of Persia and Thibet, in which countries the most ancient histories and the most recent information concur to prove the abundance of sheep, and the excellence of the wool. Even in the ardent climate of Peru, there abound certain indigenous wool bearing animals,* one race of which produces fleeces of the finest quality.

The breeds of sheep which have prevailed in the United States, till within a few years, have not been of the heavy fleeced character, except in a very few valuable instances. But, since the introduction of the Spanish merinoes, and the attraction of the public attention to some of the breeds, whose fleeces were observed to be heavy, or which are adapted to the comb, numerous experiments afford the strongest reason to believe that sheep, in this country, will be great wool bearers, according to their respective breeds. The annual shearings and exhibitions display much detailed and satisfactory evidence on this point.

Of the productions of agriculture and husbandry among the civilized nations, sheep employ the smallest number of persons, according to their value. The raising and maintenance of sheep are, so far, peculiarly adapted to our circumstances, as to extent of territory, and moderate population. Sheep are then a convenient object for the United States, as they employ more land than any other production, and we have more than we can cultivate or employ. Holland is forbidden, by her very limited soil, to be extensive, though skilful in the woollen manufacture; and imports, by her canals, most of the flax and yarn of which she makes her linens. The United States, on the contrary, are capacitated and invited, by their extensive territory, to rise, with ease and singular rapidity, into eminence in the woollen branch. The sagacity and energy of Rhode Island have given her the first comparative importance in cotton mills and establishments; but the young settlements of Maine and Vermont, by means of their more extensive territories, have enabled each of them far to exceed her in sheep, wool, and woollen manufactures. England and Wales, with only thirty-four millions of acres of land, and twenty-six to twenty-nine millions of sheep, have been said to produce one hundred and forty-five millions of pounds of wool, in every year,† and to sell to other nations more woollens than the rest of mankind exports. The English and Welsh population is about ten millions; but their progress in the production of wool seems to be arrested by the want of soil for grain, cattle, horses, and plantations of trees. Britain imports all the wool she can purchase, and pays immense sums to Ireland and to foreign countries for bread and meat, wood and timber, iron, flax, hemp, and skins, for her European and foreign dominions, armies, navies, and manufactures. Scotland, with a very sagacious, economical, and energetic population, is the least favored of the civilized nations, as to the quality of her soil. She consequently exports very few woollens from her own agriculture. It may be affirmed, then, in safe contradiction to ancient opinions, of our own and of Europe, that the abundance of the soil of the United States qualifies and irresistibly invites or impels them to continue, improve, and extend, the woollen manufacture.

The case of the Western Scottish islands, in which some stranded, captured, and fugitive vessels of the Spanish armada are believed to have left, in the year 1598, some Castilian sheep, establishes the truth, that poor dry lands will preserve, in a considerable degree, fine wool in a breed of sheep, even in a moist and rigorous climate, where the lightness of the soil has stunted the stock of the animals, and reduced the weight of the fleece; for these Scottish sheep are very small, and bear little wool. The proper temperature, dry situations, the proper lightness of food, greater care of the fleeces, in the time of growth, and increasing skill in the important operations of the wool sorter, insure us a very rapid attainment of fine wool. It must soon be more than we can want at home. But exportation takes off the woollens of a single European nation, from their own raw materials, to the amount of twenty millions of dollars, with a considerable addition from foreign wool.

The examples of all the fenny or marshy districts of Great Britain, establish the truth, that the unoccupied swamps of the United States, when they shall be properly drained, will support the heavy fleeced breeds of long woolled sheep, much of the fleeces of which is adapted to the comb, and is necessary for the "worsted" or "stuff" manufacture, for the ordinary hosiery, and for well coated blankets.

At this moment we possess, unused, a superabundant quantity of fenny, marshy, boggy, or swampy land, capable of sustaining more of the long woolled or heavy fleeced sheep, than we can want for our own use, and promising to our merchants an export trade. The most notable quantities of these lands are in the maritime counties of North Carolina and Virginia.* These large, heavy fleeced, and long woolled sheep, require to be well fed. Mixing the long woolled and other breeds, and a right management, produce great benefits to the farmer, and to the hosier class of manufacturers.

It is considered that there were at least thirteen or fourteen millions of pounds of wool sheared in the United States, in the year 1810; and that the growth of wool in the year 1812 has been twenty to twenty-two millions of pounds. There are some who believe the quantities to be rather greater, because the increase is in a large compound ratio. One-half of the young are females, and the males are wool bearers, till they are exported or consumed. Much more care of sheep is generally observable. The fleece, while growing, is better kept. There is much more care and opportunity for choice as to breeders. The merino fleece is heavier, as well as finer, than the country breeds. The embargoes, foreign restrictions, spoliation, war, and high freights, have diminished exportation; and rendering other meat and fish more difficult to sell, and combining with other causes, have doubtless affected the consumption of mutton. There has been at the same time a considerable importation of wool, and a great importation of fine wooled and heavy fleeced sheep. It is probable that no country has ever effected so great changes in the value and extent of its stock of sheep, as the United States, within a few years. There is the strongest encouragement to persevere in the preservation, multiplication, and improvement, of these animals.

The improvements in the manufacture of wool, and in the means of conducting it, have been very considerable. Carding machines have been introduced, to the number of 413, in the single State of New York. The wool picking machine also saves labor. The manufactory of hats, consuming more wool, with few hands, than any other of the ancient modes, is carried to the extent of our consumption. We begin to export hats. The European improvements to save labor, in spinning wool, have been brought into extensive use. Fulling, a labor saving process, is greatly increased. It was formerly, as in hatting, a manual operation. More, than formerly, of our wool is used in those manufactures, which do not require regular fulling, such as flannels, and goods made of combed wool. Dying is much improved by the modern aids of chemistry. The fly shuttle, which saves labor, is constantly multiplied. The loom and the weaver are much improved. Female aid in manufactures, which prevents the diversion of men and boys from agriculture, has greatly increased. Children are employed as well as the infirm and the crippled. The asylums of the poor and unfortunate, and the penitentiaries of indiscretion and immorality, are improved and aided by the employment and profits of manufactures. In the section of the Union occupied in part by colored laborers, decent and comfortable hospitals have been established upon some of the planters' estates, in which children, convalescents, aged persons, and married females, for a proper time before and after puerperal occasions, have been employed with humanity and advantage, in manufacturing cloths and stuffs, for apparel and furniture.

Modern improvements in the stocking loom, and in the shearing of woollen cloths, have been introduced into the United States, and there can be no doubt that the current of acquisition of the means of the woollen manufacture has fully equalled the great and manifest increase of the raw material. Indeed, it may be safely affirmed, that the manufacturer's demand has continued to exceed the farmer's ability to supply the various descriptions of wool. The sheep were formerly a mere object of domestic economy and convenience, and have at length become a great and universal object of agricultural profit and wealth. Besides the increase in the number of sheep, and the goodness of wool, the price of the three established qualities has sustained an addition of fifty per centum.

Iron.—In the iron branch, the consumption of that most useful natural production takes place in a manner yielding an accumulation of benefits to the landed interest. This is displayed in various labor-saving nail mills, the improvements in the easy operation of casting iron and steel, the very rapid progress in the wire manufactory, the sudden creation of private armories and military foundries, the multiplication of the rolling and slitting mill, the boring mill, the grinding mill, the polishing and metal turning machinery, the tilt or trip hammer, the wool card making machinery, the nailed shoe, the manufactories of surgical instruments, of cannon ball and shells, the machinery for making screws, the saw, file, and edge tool manufactories, the multiplication of steel and common furnaces, bloomeries, and forges, the innumerable black and white smiths' shops, for every iron implement and necessary of farming, planting, manufacture, and navigation. The benefits to the landed interest, from the consumption of so great a quantity of iron, fuel, food, forage, and building materials, and the employment of so many cattle and mill seats as the iron manufacturers require, are great and evident; but the aid to agriculture, from the abundant, cheap, sure, and adjacent supply of iron work, for every purpose of the garden, the field, and the family, is incalculable and indispensable. Not a building for man, for cattle, nor for the safe keeping of produce or merchandise—not a plough, a mill, a loom, a wheel, a spindle, a carding machine, a fire arm, a sword, a wagon, or a ship, can be provided, without the manufactures of the iron branch.

Leather.—The manufactures of hides and skins are of great importance to agriculture. The coats of animals, nearly excluded, by the introduction and improvements of the cloth manufacture, from their original uses in making garments, would become a mere offal, but for their present employment in leathern goods. Bark, abounding every where in America, is redundant in new settlements, where the tanning business facilitates the destruction of the forests, which obstruct agriculture. This manufacture has an additional value in producing a market for lime. A method of splitting skins has been invented, and an improvement in making shoes, which saves four-fifths of the workmanship, has been discovered. The uses of leather are of the utmost importance to health, the facilitation of industry, the diffusion of knowledge, and the military operations of the United States, by land and sea. The shoes, boots, and slippers, manufactured in 1812, undoubtedly exceeded the value of all the manufactures imported in the first year of the present Government, which, by the actual return of November 30, 1791, were worth here only 15,295,638 dollars. The shoemakers' wares of the entire State of Massachusetts, through the production of handicraft, are equal, in their total value, to its proportion, according to its population, of one moiety of the exports of goods of our growth, produce, and manufacture, in the most favorable year. Were shoes, boots, and slippers, manufactured in the same proportion to numbers in all the States, they would be equal in value to twenty-four millions and sixty-seven thousand dollars. The cordwainers' purchases are the greatest support of the leather branch. Upon an examination of the number of shoes, boots, and slippers, saddles and bridles, harness, carriages, (many of which have leathern boots, tops, curtains, and aprons,) drums, gloves, leathern breeches, rigging, and other hides for ships and vessels, bound books, manufacturing cards and carding machines, military equipments, and other leathern goods, there will appear no reason to doubt, that a value of leathern manufactures is annually made in the United States, fully equal to that of half our exports of our own productions and manufactures. These are real necessities or plain conveniences. The Americans consuming more animal food than any other people, in proportion to our numbers, being near to the greatest foreign sources of unmanufactured hides, and being invited to sheep, swine, and cattle farming, by our own redundant soil, with cheaper water and land, proper oils, lime, and bark, for the leather making business, than any other country, our leathern branch must continue to be very considerable, and rapidly to extend and improve. It is not doubted that it is at present equal in value to the same branch in any other country, in proportion to the population, if the same qualities of goods be estimated at the same prices. These facts, in relation to the leather branch, are of peculiar importance, as it is a manufacture by hand and not by machinery. They prove our capacity even in the handicraft branches.

Flax.—The manufactures of flax, existing in every part of the United States, afford conclusive evidence of the universal ability to produce this raw material. Agriculture might, therefore, be more considerably supported by it, if there were occasion. But the easier production and manufacture of cotton occasions a small and proper degree of attention to flax in the greater part of the southern section of this country. As flax requires but a small quantity of land, especially where a great stock of farmer's animals produces abundance of manure, its cultivation and manufacture are particularly convenient and important to the fully settled districts which do not yield cotton. Our climate is favorable to bleaching. In Connecticut, though much advanced in cotton spinning, there is returned a diffused manufacture of various linen cloths, (besides sewing thread, linen chain for mixed goods, tapes, bobbins, fringes, lace, webbing, &c.,) equal to the yearly rate of three dollars and five cents and one-half per head, which is at the rate of 22,081,704 dollars for the whole population of the United States. Yet Connecticut has many convenient seaports. Her return, too, is considered to be materially short. Vermont makes linen at a nearly equal rate. Two hundred thousand spinning wheels (of which about two-fifth parts are probably employed on flax) in the two States, whose returns of that very useful and general little machine, are the most complete, give an additional evidence of the present condition of this manufacture. But for the growth of cotton, the flax manufacture would have become very great. Many families in the United States derive their origin from nations the most successful in the linen manufacture during our two centuries. Such of the States as may not very greatly increase their sheep, for want of land, or for other reasons, will be particularly accommodated by the cultivation and manufacture of flax. Oil mills, for crushing and pressing flax seed, have been so multiplied within a few years, as to prove the extension of the linen branch, and materially to benefit the growers of flax, especially those whose distance from the seaports prevents recourse to foreign markets in disposing of their seed. The actual extension and improvements in all the arts and trades which employ paints, are favorable to the sale of flax seed oil. The economy and beauty of painting all wooden and many other constructions, especially the preservation of those which are exposed to the weather, occasions the manufacture of this oil greatly to increase in quantity and value. The use of the oil cake yields a benefit to the country. Modern, and particularly recent improvements in dressing, spinning, weaving, and bleaching flax, have greatly facilitated the manufacture of this raw material. The United States are perfectly prepared for such an extension of it as to maintain a steady demand equal to our power conveniently to raise flax; wherefore, agriculture will certainly continue to be extensively and very considerably aided by it, in all places which are without the region of the cotton cultivation. We have regularly imported flax from the distant markets of Russia, because the demand of the manufacturers could not be satisfied by all the exertions of our farmers. This was the case before labor-saving machinery was introduced, which adds to the proof of our capacity for even handicraft goods or proper manufactures.

Hemp.—The ability to produce hemp is enjoyed by every State in the American Union. Soil, climate, industry, machinery, situation, and the possession of capital in the shape of the raw material, appear to have carried this branch to the greatest height in the State of Kentucky, even since the extension of the cotton culture in that quarter. The marshal reports a production, in 1810, of 5,755 tons, in the prepared state. But, as there are made, in Kentucky, 453,750 yards of hempen bagging cloth, for packing cotton, and one thousand nine hundred and ninety-one and one-half tons of cordage, and much yarn; and, moreover, as the various hempen, flaxen, cotton, and woollen cloths and stuffs, of that State, in 1810, are reported to have amounted to 2,216,526 dollars, it is manifest that the landed interest is much assisted by the hempen manufacture.* Im-

* It appears that, if the United States were to manufacture cloths and stuffs, in as great a degree as is reported by Kentucky, (which has no seaport,) in proportion to the whole population of that State and of the Union, our manufactures of such goods might provements in the process for separating the fibres of hemp from the woody part, labor-saving machinery to manufacture it, and skill in the cultivation, resulting from the introduction of experienced manufacturers, have enhanced the aggregate value of hempen goods, and increased their importance to agriculture. So much greater has been the demand for hemp, at home, than the practical ability hitherto to supply it, that importation, to a very considerable amount, has regularly taken place, although there is an extraordinary duty on foreign hemp, and although the cultivation and manufacture of cotton have suddenly and greatly interfered with the manufacture of this raw material. The manufacture of hemp being of the utmost importance to the supplies of the army and navy, and to public defence on the water and on land, the United States can only be rendered perfectly safe and independent by early and effectual encouragements to the growth, preparation, and manufacture, of hemp. It is of no less importance than those of arms and gunpowder. To separate all the fibrous from the ligneous parts of this raw material, without converting too much of the strong and good staple into worthless tow, by ill management, would occasion the quantity for manufacture to be much larger, and the profits to the cultivator to be more considerable, and would render the operations of the manufacturers more easy and successful. Improvements in all the machinery for hemp are worthy of peculiar attention and exertion.

Wood.—The numerous and diversified manufactures of wood, and the consumption of wood in the business and families of the manufacturers, occasion vast benefits to the landed interest, in all situations, maritime and interior.

The coopers and carpenters' packages for exported goods, alone, probably exceed two millions two hundred thousand in number. To these may be added as many, or more, for home use. The ships and boats of the United States, at their greatest amount, on a medium of a period of three years, have been computed at forty-five millions of dollars. Staves, heading, and boards, may be deemed simple or imperfect manufactures of wood. Carriages for pleasure, business, and war, cabinet wares, saddle-trees, turnery, with ploughs, harrows, corn fans, hand and wheelbarrows, wooden measures, mill work and machinery, wooden instruments, implements, and utensils, with the wooden handles of metallic instruments, amount to more than eighty-four millions of yards. The return is doubtless very short. Though hemp, freed from the woody part, and only prepared for spinning, is not set down among the manufactures, yet it is materially advanced from the raw state by that preparation. That the general return of Kentucky is very short, will appear certain, when it is observed that shoes, and other manufactures of tanned leather, hats, all manufactures of iron, (except bars, castings, and cut nails,) of copper, brass, silver, and gold, of clocks and watches, of lead, of pewter, of tin, of casks, of meal, of carriages, of cabinet ware, of books, and various other goods, are omitted.

pot ashes, maple sugar, tar, pitch, and turpentine, from the various forest trees, ashes for the soap manufactory, bark, and wood fuel, including charcoal, are examples of wooden goods drawn from our forests. It may be safely alleged, that the natural and cultivated trees of the United States are rendered, by manufactures, a very great benefit to the landed interest. It is considered that pot ashes and pearl ashes nearly compensate the settler for the expense of clearing the portion of a new farm assigned for cultivation, in all situations convenient to boat navigation. The bark of the cork tree is used in other countries as a material to manufacture, and might be added, by means of plantations, to the North American productions. It is an evergreen forest tree in Spain and Portugal, and is found in the southwestern angle of France, in temperatures corresponding with those of Georgia and the two Carolinas, and the Southwestern States and Territories. We have obtained the cork-cutting business, before the landed interest have procured the exotic tree, or supplied the material. It is an impressive fact, that manufactures, in America, outrun agriculture in most instances.

The oils of vegetables and animals, which are generally from the cultivated lands of the United States, form a very valuable class of simple manufactures, greatly beneficial to the agricultural interest. These are flax seed oil, castor oil, soap, candles, lard, rendered tallow, wax, butter, and cheese. We might add the olive oil, as we have the proper temperatures in the country south of the Chesapeake bay. A labor-saving machine has been introduced, by American ingenuity, into the manufactories of common dipped candles. Rape seed oil might be made in all the States. Fish oil being necessary to make good leather, the fisheries of the Lakes and Western rivers merit consideration, as to a possibility of improvement. The aggregate of the areas of the Lakes is as great as a considerable sea. The caviar and isinglass are objects of attention and profit in Russia. The sturgeon from which they are made, is Acipenser, Rulh. et Stur. Linnae. It abounds in the fresh waters of the Don and the Wolga, and is suitable for our Lakes.

Dyes and Paints.—Indigo, dying woods, and plants and pigments, of various kinds, used in manufactures, are additional instances of the benefits of that branch of our national industry to the owners and cultivators of the soil. Manufacturing all we produce of lead, we have been obliged to import a large balance of that useful metal, for our workmen, after using all our own lead, which is convertible into various pigments, is a raw material of several useful manufactures, in its separate state, or mixed with other metals. The rapid advance of lead manufactures, on the purchase of Louisiana, proves that they not only steadily progress, but rapidly extend, on every new supply of the raw material. Manufactures goad the whole landed interest to profitable production.

Tobacco.—The manufacture of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, has become a very considerable benefit to the planter. Labor-saving machinery does much in this branch. Our manufactory has mitigated the shock given by the recent wars and foreign commercial impediments to the tobacco cultivation. We are equal to the supply of any demand for the export trade, in snuff and tobacco, after an abundant reserve for home consumption.

Fruit.—Manufactures from fruit are every where economical, and, in many places, highly profitable to the farmer, and admit of a vast and profitable extension. These are cider, apple and peach brandy, the wine of the Corinth fruit,* or currant wine, and vinegar in its ordinary state, and prepared with the juices of the various fruits. It is believed that the extent in which the American currant wine has been already made, has not been observed or considered, nor are its pleasantness, utility, facility of manufacture, nor our vast capacity for the manufacture, sufficiently known, or duly appreciated. The red, black, and white currants grow and produce well in our most Northern and Eastern States, and in colder parts of Europe. The proper Corinthian grape was found in the climate of Southern Greece, and its island of Zante. The red, black, and white currants are indigenous or domesticated here. They all yield wine. The quantity of two barrels, or sixty-three gallons, may be easily made in every farmer's family, without the use of more ground than he ought to appropriate for his common kitchen garden, and with as little trouble as that necessary to make butter, cheese, cider, or beer. Even the inhabitants of the cities, and other towns, who have gardens, or who purchase currants, may make the currant or Corinthian wine. Our million of white families (by the census of 1810) at a medium of sixty-three gallons each, or two barrels, are capable of preparing sixty-three millions of gallons—a quantity nearly twelve times as great as that of all the wine received from abroad, or twenty-three times the quantity consumed in the United States.† It is, doubtless, capable of distillation into brandy. It would be a profitable business to make Corinthian wine upon the great scale, and it is far more worthy of attention, in the country north of the Bay of Chesapeake, than the cultivation of the wine grapes of Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, and their islands. No beverage is more pleasant; none, it is believed, more wholesome; and it would afford an universal opportunity to mitigate the ardor or diminish the use of distilled spirits. The currant, or Corinthian wine, if made extensively in the United States, would greatly increase the benefits of the manufactures of fruit liquors to the cultivators and land-holders, which are already very considerable, convenient, and profitable.

As in relation to the quantity of wool, so in relation to the manufactures of the grape, the opinion is submitted, that the Aurantia Sinensis, or the China orange, is an useful indicator of climatal temperature. Presuming upon the difference of nine degrees, which the steady productions of that delicate fruit appear to justify, the following table of corresponding temperature, in relation to the finest wines of considerable productions on the continent of Europe, is respectfully offered, since wines, or fermented spirits, brandies, and cremor tartar, or the salt of wine, are manufactures from the grape.

Moselle, Rhenish, and Hock wines, are produced in 49° to 50° North latitude in Europe—equal, in North America, to 40° to 41°.

Champaign wine, in 49° North latitude in Europe—equal, in North America, to 40°.

Burgundy wine, in 47° to 48° North latitude in Europe—equal, in North America, to 38° to 39°.

Claret, Sauterne, and Grave wines, in 44½° to 45½° North latitude in Europe—equal, in North America to 35½° to 36½°.

Oporto, or Port wine, 41° 20' North latitude in Europe—equal, in North America, to 32° 20'.

Lisbon and Carcavela wines, 38½° to 39½° North latitude—equal, in North America, to 29½° to 30½°.

Xeres or Sherry, St. Lucar, and Malaga, or mountain wines, in 37° 28' North latitude—equal, in North America, to 28° 28'.

Cider and Perry.—The manufactures of cider and perry are so highly perfected in Europe, that the former liquor, of the most excellent quality, has been sold for prices greater than the first costs of some of the wines of the European and African islands, and of those continents. Much more might be safely asserted of the British cider. The American cider advances rapidly in quantity and quality. So far as either the fining, fermentation, or ripening of the liquor, or the quality of the fruit, may be effected by the temperature of the climate, the same difference of nine degrees may be considered in relation to the cider countries of Europe and America. It is conceived that, in safe comparisons of places, the situations of both should be on continents. The climates of islands of the same magnitude may also be compared in the same manner.

Grain.—The evidences of the immense advantages which the landed interest derives from manufactures, will be concluded by the adduction of some facts in relation to those from grain. A single State returns the various descriptions of meal and flour to the amount of almost eleven millions of dollars, made at two hundred and eight mills, besides more than $4,365,000 in value in fermented malt liquors and distilled spirits, chiefly from grain. Cider is not included. The whole value of the distilled spirits from molasses, grain, and fruit, made in the United States, appears to have been above fifteen millions and a half of dollars, in 1810. Much the greater part is made of grain; to those are to be added wafers, starch, hair-powder, and all the varieties of the bakers' goods. Considering flour and meal, bolted, sometimes kiln dried, and packed in casks for exportation, and biscuit so packed and prepared, as manufactures from grain, it appears that our exports of these goods, in one year, have amounted to 1,557,000 casks, of various sizes. In fine, such is the vast importance of this branch, that, were the grain mills, bake-houses, starch, hair-powder, and wafer manufactories, breweries, and distilleries, of the United States, suspended in their operations, the body of the farmers and the planters would be wounded and crippled in most places, and paralyzed in many of the States. It is an important fact, that manufactories of grain (such as the brewery and distillery) insure this country against a distressful famine, because we could consume, in a scarce year, in bread, that which was raised to make liquors.

Such are the principal facts which occur to recollection at this time, evincing the benefit, to the cultivator and owners of the soil, from the manufactures which have arisen, unforced, in the United States. Their principal, protection by duties was incidental. Those duties were imposed to raise the necessary revenue, and greatly favored the manufacturers. I proceed to submit some of those facts which evidence the aid afforded by our manufacturing industry to navigation and commerce.

Navigation and Commerce.—The construction of ships and vessels, with their boats, may be considered as having produced an accumulation of that description of manufactured property, in the year 1810, amounting to a million of tons, and worth the sum of forty-five millions of dollars, properly estimating the old, the new, and the half worn. The cloth of which the sails were made, and an inconsiderable sum in bunting or worsted stuff, for colors, with a smaller sum in optical and other instruments, are all the foreign articles, in this great value, of those indispensable requisites to commerce, navigation, and commercial defence. Although the cannon, muskets, pistols, swords, pikes, shot, ball, shells, and gunpowder, of the public and private armed ships, are now made in the United States, to an amount very far beyond the quantity demanded for our mercantile and military vessels, the cost of these articles is not included in the sum of forty-five millions, above mentioned.

The navy, private armed ships, and letter of marque ships, are also constructed or manufactured in the United States; and being of the utmost importance to the defence of commerce, their manufacture appears to be a proper object of statement under this head.

The working carriages employed in the various operations of commerce, with many of the scales and weights, measures, and other utensils, and instruments of trade, are made in our work shops.

The number of American articles, in the regular lists of the exports of the United States, is about one hundred and ten, of which about seventy are manufactures of the United States, subserving commerce, by affording new, various, and more convenient articles of exportation. Among these are included flour, bread, boards, and scantling, with other articles, not always considered as manufactures. But, if we did not make boards, scantling, shingles, staves, heading, flour, meal, and biscuit, the foreign sugar colonies would not take off much of our wheat and timber. The manufactures of wool and grain render the original productions or materials convenient to our general trade, and absolutely necessary to some of its branches. The value of some of our exported manufactures, as they are sometimes strictly considered, may not exceed three millions of dollars, but these constitute an interesting assistance to foreign trade, and are steadily increasing. If, however, we add 1,557,000 casks of flour, meal, and biscuit, at an average price of eight dollars, with two hundred and twenty millions of feet and pieces of sawed, split, and dressed boards, plank, scantling, staves, &c., and some other articles of a like nature, the manufacturing operation, though imperfect, becomes very influential on the convenience of stowage, the benefit of freight, the accommodation of purchasers, and, subsequently, upon the activity and prosperity of commerce.

The manufacturers assist the merchants by their purchases of very large quantities of foreign raw materials, imported in their vessels. These are, wool, hemp, flax, and cotton, iron and steel, saltpetre, sulphur, hides, skins, and leather, indigo, fustic, and other dye wood and dye stuffs, lead, copper, and brass, in pigs and sheets, tin in blocks and sheets, spelter, molasses, raw sugars, cocoa, mahogany and other cabinet woods, wines and spirits, for medical manufactures, rags, and many other articles, with coal for the supply of their laboratories, furnaces, forges, and work shops. The manufacturers also purchase, for their domestic consumption, great quantities of imported goods, benefitting the merchant.

The transportation of American raw materials, fuel, and building materials, for the workmen, occasions a very great trade and business in boats, shallops, and coasting vessels, highly favorable to the merchants who own them; and the transportation of American manufactures, in like manner, to the markets on our rivers, bays, and coasts, is profitable to the owners of vessels. In Great Britain, the largest portion of the tonnage in any branch, is that in the coasting trade. This branch, of manufacturing commerce rapidly increases.

The most distinguished modern commercial countries in the world import great quantities of raw materials, and export large quantities of manufactures. These operations constitute, in fact, the greater part of their commerce. In those countries, many of their most respectable merchants have become partners in their manufactures. The export trade in British manufactures, before the wars which have grown out of the French Revolution, constituted much the largest part of the outward trade, and it seems likely to become equally considerable, in proportion to their exports, on the return of a general peace. This export trade in the valuable manufactures of the British Kingdom, is now extensively conducted by persons who combine the business of the manufacturer with that of the foreign merchant, or, in other words, who unite those two great branches of commerce in their respective houses. A similar and great field for capital and mercantile enterprise manifestly lies open before the American merchants; and some of them have entered upon it with capital, spirit, and success. So far as labor-saving machinery has been employed in the operations, the persons who have undertaken them have proved the benefits of manufactures to the mercantile capitalist; and, in other considerable instances, the same advantageous employment of trading capital has occurred.

The banks established in the United States, which are the most wealthy and important of our institutions of property, are mercantile corporations. The deposits and discounts of the sugar refiners, millers, bakers, distillers, brewers, cotton spinners, woollen manufacturers, hatters, nail makers, iron masters, various smiths, coopers, tanners, shoemakers, ropemakers, &c. are highly profitable to them, and are uncommonly safe. Since our exports of our own productions are known to be worth forty-eight millions of dollars, and the aggregate value of our manufactures may be safely estimated at three and one half or four times that sum, it is plain that the custom of the manufacturers is highly important to our banking companies. Many of our manufacturers are proprietors of the stocks of the banks of the United States, and thus lend to the merchants.

Insurances on manufactures, raw materials, vessels employed in transporting them, coastwise, and from and to foreign countries, and upon the manufacturing establishments themselves, afford considerable benefit to the private underwriters and insurance companies. Many persons concerned in these mercantile institutions are engaged in manufacturing houses and associations.

The greater prosperity of British commerce, with great and various manufactures, and the lesser prosperity of Irish commerce, with fewer and less various manufactures, afford the most conclusive evidence of the benefit of manufactures to foreign trade. This is the more clear and strong, because the soil of Ireland, in proportion to its extent, is better than that of Great Britain. The greater prosperity of British commerce, in time of peace, with superior manufactures, and the lesser prosperity of French commerce, in the same season, with inferior manufactures, is a further evidence of the benefits of the useful arts to foreign trade. The prosperity of American trade with manufactures, in the seven years which preceded the year 1810, (the date of the following tables,) was superior to that of the seven years preceding the adoption of the Federal Constitution, with less manufactures, and to the seven years which preceded the Revolutionary war, almost without manufactures.

The richest object of commercial enterprise for the merchants of the United States is the trade of those countries which do not manufacture. Of this, the trade of our American brethren from Texas and Mexico to the Straits of Magellan, is an inestimable instance. We can import their raw materials and export our manufactures to an immense amount, with substantial benefit. Their rich products will not often be received in the ports of Europe, in our vessels, foreign to them. Their copper, crude sugar, peculiar cottons and woods, their various dyeing materials, drugs, and medicines, their wool, hides, and tallow, and their gold and silver, will be exchanged for cabinet wares, carriages, paper, refined sugar, beer, distilled spirits, candles, hats, boots, shoes, gold and silver plate and jewelry, pottery, iron manufactures, mill work, copper manufactures, machinery, types, gunpowder, arms, ships, and other vessels, boats, and various other manufactures of the United States. They do not want our provisions, tobacco, cotton, lumber, indigo, and other articles of unmanufactured produce. If we had only such raw productions, commerce between the United States and foreign America would be very limited and unprofitable. As our manufactures progress, the trade with that near and connected country, and with St. Domingo, and all the countries similarly circumstanced, cannot fail to increase. Even the manufacturing nations will be induced to purchase our goods, which can be made with vast advantages of labor-saving machinery operating upon raw materials, exempted from the duties and other charges of importation. If we have re-shipped to other countries tens of millions of the foreign manufactures of Great Britain, Ireland, Russia, Germany, France, and the East Indies, we may ship to the same place, the productions of our own national industry. If Great Britain, the East Indies, Germany, France, and Russia, find in foreign countries purchasers for their manufactures, we may be able to do the same. Since the Government is impartial and friendly to our merchants and manufacturers, those two descriptions of our citizens may liberally and profitably aid each other, as those do who live as fellow-citizens in foreign countries.

The establishment of many new manufactures in the United States, from foreign materials, occasions new demands for foreign materials, to be so employed. The merchants, alone, can import those materials, and they must be imported in their ships. This facilitates remittances, which, in many trades, are difficult and unprofitable.

The greatest drain of their coin and bullion which the United States sustain, is in the remittances for manufactures to foreign countries. By our own manufactures we diminished this drain in part, and they already furnish us with substitutes for remittances in the precious metals, in a further part, by enabling us to send abroad wrought goods, to the value of three millions of dollars. Everything that facilitates the retention of our coin and bullion, is considered as favorable to the merchants and to our commercial or banking institutions and operations. A balance of trade in favor of the country is an advantage to the mercantile body, and, by our manufactures, we shall bring more nations in debt to us, than we formerly did. So far as we export manufactures we now contribute to that end.

Manufactures, to a considerable amount, such as malt and distilled liquors, loaf sugar, cheese, candles, and soap, are consumed among the stores of seamen and passengers. Manufacturers who come to the United States, pay to our merchants passage money for themselves and their families, and freight money for their future and other personal property, imported in our vessels.

The commerce among the several States in the American Union, in the raw materials, manufactures, and provisions of our country, is a branch of trade more certain than any other. It does not depend upon foreign laws. Remote foreign markets are less accessible in war. The commerce among the States, always interesting, derives the utmost additional importance from the recent deportment of too many of the naval Powers. It is an evident and important fact, that this mutual and increasing exchange of raw productions, fuel, and provisions, for finished manufactures, between the producing and manufacturing States, has become a decisive consideration for the continuance of the Federal Union—a connexion vital to the general commerce of the American People. The manifest difficulty of securing justice in commercial affairs, even by the whole of the United States, affords conclusive evidence that any two possible sections, into which they might be cut, would fail to maintain the standing of a trading nation.

The Fisheries.—The benefits to the fisheries of the United States, resulting from manufactures, are considerable, stable, and increasing.

Our manufactures near the seacoast consume very large quantities of dried and pickled fish. They employ, in their manufactures, the head matter of the whale to make the superior oil. This will not coagulate, and it is fit for use in lighthouses and lamps, in cold and wet situations. From its purity, it is adapted to the consumption of good and well furnished houses. The residuum of the same material is used for making spermaceti candles.

The umbrella makers, manufacturers of whips, fishing tackle, stay makers, &c., employ the whale fins or whalebone, the little cuttings and chips of which have been applied to making patent brushes, composed of split bone, in lieu of strong hair.

The coarser oils are used in lamps, in many of the work shops, and in the dressing of leather; and, in short, as the manufacturers of the world, at home and abroad, use nearly all the piscatory articles, in some one form or another, so those of the United States have long used some, and have increased in the use of others; and since foreign laws burden those articles with ruinous duties, it is certain that our manufacturers' purchases may be hereafter relied on as a great and sure support to the fisheries of the United States.

In all those particulars in which manufactures support and assist navigation, they benefit the fisheries; for, ships and other vessels, and boats of every size and description, are employed in the fisheries, armed and unarmed; and as manufactures have strong and beneficial effects upon the coasting trade, and all our fishing vessels, except the large whalers, are adapted to, and actually partake in, that great and sure branch of the domestic trade, it is a very important fact, that the manufactures of the United States, in that respect, greatly benefit the numerous owners of fishing vessels. Too small for most voyages to other countries, and excluded by foreign navigation laws from many adjacent ports, the transportation, for our manufacturers, of raw materials, provisions, fuel, building materials, and manufactured goods, become to them a very necessary support, whenever they are disappointed in taking fish. The fishing season is but a portion of the year. Out of that season, the coasting trade affords convenient employment to fishing vessels.

The manufacture of salt is a very considerable aid to the fisheries. If the temperature of the climates, in which lie the best salt ponds of Europe, be proved (by the growth of the sweet orange tree) to be the same as those of the Floridas and Louisiana, and if it be recollected that the best French European salt is made without fuel, and by the natural evaporation by the sun, in a temperature corresponding with that of the Accomac coast of Virginia, the beneficial effects of this manufacture may be deemed permanent and increasing. The fairest and purest marine salt of France is made on the Isle of Rhé, in north latitude 46 degrees and 15 minutes. It is made by the sun as far North as Bourneuf, Croisac, and Guesrande, in ancient Brittany, and the latitude of 47 degrees.

All the peculiar tackle and instruments of the fisheries are well manufactured in the United States, and the fishermen themselves, at leisure times, make a number of them, by which many of the benefits of domestic or household manufactures are realized. This remark also applies to the manufacture of a great part of the oil. The packing of a cask of fish, and the making of the cask and of the pickle, add as much per centum to the value of the fish, as the corresponding operations add to the value of several raw materials; some of the European economical writers, therefore, class salted and pickled meats and fish among their manufactures.

From a review of these facts, not only the peculiar benefits rendered by the manufacturers to the fisheries are evinced, but, it is apparent that the operations of the fishermen partake strongly of the manufacturing character.

Defence.—It has been considered as proper to submit, under a separate and distinct head, another class of facts, relating to such manufactures as are useful or necessary to the defence of the United States.

It has occasionally been deemed expedient to restrain the exportation of those manufactures which are requisite for war. From this consideration, and from obvious policy, the Federal and State Governments are conceived to have wisely partaken, even in the manufactories of such warlike goods, and to have encouraged them, by high duties and by advances in specie, or in raw materials. Difficulties arising from a want of capital, are thus surmounted, in cases wherein the public purchases are often the principal, and always very considerable.

Digest of Manufactures.

The important modern operation of casting of cannon, without a calibre, and boring them out of the solid iron, for the reception of the ball by water machinery, was first performed at the public expense in the United States. Several armories, for small fire arms and swords, have been established by the States and by the Union. Contracts, with advances of money, not only for making arms and other military manufactures, but for importations of the proper raw materials, have been repeatedly made, and to a large amount, upon security. Adversary belligerents have forbidden or prevented the exportation of warlike manufactures to the United States, during our late neutrality. Indian wars, occasions of apparent danger from abroad, and the commercial demands on this country for military supplies for various foreign places, within the last twenty years, have caused very considerable attention to the repair and manufacture of arms, and to making establishments for these and other instruments and munitions of war in the United States. It may be safely affirmed that there is no irremovable obstacle to the manufacture of every species of arms, and almost every supply of war, of good qualities, and in sufficient quantities. A well devised system of inspection exists in some branches of manufacture, under several of the State Governments, and such a system, as to military supplies, has been proved to be indispensably necessary, by the experience of the Union and of the States, on many occasions, during the greater part of the last twenty years. But, whatever has been the amelioration of this important operation, within two or three years, the ordinary commerce and exportation of arms, without inspection, is yet practicable, while the trade in flour, wet provisions, lumber, potashes, and other goods, in several of the States, has been wisely placed under a very strict and salutary regimen of inspection.

Since various foreign nations have obstructed military supplies, which we have endeavored to procure from their ports, and since the present war has imparted the contraband character to all such things, the importance of the manufactures of that description to the defence of the country, particularly at this time, is very great and manifest.

The possession of iron, lead, saltpetre, charcoal, wood for ships and vessels, for military carpentry, and for every description of the wooden implements of war, and the constant supplies of foreign raw materials, for warlike manufactures, enable the United States to make the necessary establishments. Accordingly, it appears that cannon foundries, and all other military works and shops, are as practicable as they are indispensable to the peace, the union, and safety of the country. The difference in the situations of the United States, at the respective commencements of hostilities, in the year 1775, and in the year 1812, is greater, in respect to the various manufactures necessary to defence, than it is in respect to any other matter in the whole circle of its national industry. In the times of the Provinces, the public defence was under the care and control of an external and distant national Government, which preferred to draw the public supplies from the manufactures of the metropolitan State, adjacent to its Court and offices. But now, the all-important principle of internal resource, well understood, and the present state of American industry, occasion a course diametrically opposite to be maintained by the Union, the States, many associations, and numerous individuals.

Labor-saving Machinery and Cotton.—It is a fact, in the history of the manufactures of the United States, that, in some very important instances, the knowledge or acquisition of the means of manufacturing has occasioned excitements and exertions of the cultivators to produce the raw materials. In this complex business, success in one portion of the means has quickened the exertions to procure the remainder. In the year 1786, I became well acquainted with the fact, that labor-saving spinning machinery was in considerable use in Great Britain. It was understood that it was applicable, at that time, only to the carding and spinning of cotton, which we constantly imported from foreign countries. In the course of the following Autumn and Winter, repeated examinations and considerations of this subject occasioned very high expectations, from a few well authenticated facts in relation to the production of the cotton raw material in gardens and other small pieces of land, as far north as the latitude of thirty-eight degrees and forty-five minutes,* and in some other places on the rivers of the Chesapeake bay. It was inferred, that, as the shrub or tree grew in that central degree, in our country, all the extensive region south of thirty-nine was capable of producing cotton, which is found not only in climates hotter than the warmest of those of North America, but in the torrid zone. It was therefore confidently presumed, that the cotton spinning mill might be brought into very beneficial use in the United States. The production of cotton in the old settlements of Virginia, was carefully examined, as a test of this opinion, and opportunities offered to make it in a manner commanding entire confidence. After the more exact information of the existence and operations of the labor-saving cotton machinery, in Europe, had led to the due reflection on the importance of the vast capacity of this country to produce the proper raw material, the most effectual measures were actively pursued to excite the attention of the whole community, and particularly of the planters of the five original Southern States. But, though our capacity to produce cotton was so great, as we at this time know it to have always been, though labor-saving machinery was effecting wonders in Great Britain, and though common cotton was then worth, in the United States, forty-four cents per pound, owing to foreign trade laws, and though it was at a high price in many parts of Europe, several years elapsed before sufficient attention to the culture could be excited, even by the numerous publications which were incessantly made.

At length, however, the proper consideration of this great natural capacity of the Southern States, and of the peculiar value of labor-saving machinery to a nation of moderate numbers, dwelling in a country of redundant soil, with the all-important discovery of the saw-gin, has occasioned our cultivators to produce the requisite cotton. These two machines for cleaning cotton, in America, and for spinning it, abroad and at home, with the ordinary modes of household manufacture, have drawn the planters into an enriching revolution in the Southern agriculture.

The principle of labor-saving means of manufacture being thus brought into consideration and practice, in the case of machinery; and labor-saving processes, such as the brewery, distillery, and tannery, being drawn into similar notice, a new and very beneficial career in the national industry has been commenced by the United States. Carded and combed wool, flax, and hemp, have been subsequently subjected to manufacturing machinery, adapted to their respective forms and natures. We have been taught that thirty thousand pieces of metal have been coined and counted in England, in a single hour, by a steam engine, adapted to mechanism, capable of application to the button manufactory, and to other branches susceptible of such operations. Several nail making machines of curious facility and great utility, have been invented in the United States. Certain skins, formerly half expended in offal parings, or remaining of an useless thickness, have been split, by an American invention, into two equal and useful parts. The simple but tedious operations of the dip manufactory of tallow candles, have been abridged or accelerated by a labor-saving wheel. The mechanism for steam has undergone a variety of new and curious modifications in this country, greatly extending the uses of that vast and omnipresent power, in modes directly or indirectly subservient to manufactures. An improvement in the construction of draught casks has been invented, to obviate the great expense of bottling malt and other fermented liquors. A simple, cheap, and rapid chemical process has been discovered to extract the ill-flavored empyreumatic oil from distilled spirits. Since the confirmation of the settlements in this country, hydraulics, geometry, chemistry, and all the arts and sciences, have been rendered very extensively subservient to manufactures and the useful arts. Deeply impressed with the peculiar value to them of these modern aids and means, the people of the United States seek the establishment of manufactures by every variety of ingenious mechanism, process, and device, which, while they save time and labor, manifestly exempt them from the deleterious modes of the old manufacturing system. If, in other countries, and in former times, various classes of morbid and decrepit persons were produced by the ancient method of making goods only by human hands, and the citizens of America shall continue to pursue, to the utmost of their power, the use of water, steam, horses, cattle, machinery, dexterity, and various modern processes and devices, to effect the same beneficial ends, they will prevent the creation and existence of those sickly and deformed classes of people in this country. Women, relieved in a considerable degree from their former employments as carders, spinners, and fullers, by hand, occasionally turn to the occupations of the weaver, with improved machinery, and instruments, which abridge and soften the labor, while the male weavers employ themselves in superintendence, instruction, superior or other operations, and promote their health by occasional attentions to gardening, agriculture, and the clearing and improvement of their farms. The lapse of a few years will release from the restraint of the patent, the iron bound shoe, (the rights to make which are much diffused,) when the sedentary labors of the journeymen will be greatly relieved. The dangerous services of the sedentary writer's desk, have been lessened by the printing, copperplate, and copying-presses, and several pentagraphic and other graphic inventions. Many of the uses of the labors of the statuary and the painter have been attained by the multiplied portraits and scenic representations of the various classes of engravers. The auxiliary part of the making of men's apparel, is extensively performed by the aid of females, formed by nature and habit for sedentary occupations. Some branches of manufacture unfavorable to health, are unsuitable to us, and will be long unknown in our country, and other branches, formerly of the same ill tendency, have been exempted from their pernicious effects by the employment of mills and the improvements in the operations, and in the construction of laboratories. It is a manifest truth, that, besides the proper personal powers, industry, and skill, of the United States, we have attained by water, steam, cattle, labor-saving machinery, and chemistry, the means to effect, with an exactness and promptitude beyond the reach of manual power and skill, a great variety and number of manufacturing operations. These wonderful machines, working as if they were animated beings, endowed with all the talents of their inventors, laboring with organs that never tire, and subject to no expense of food, or bed, or raiment, or dwelling, may be justly considered as equivalent to an immense body of manufacturing recruits, enlisted in the service of the country.

In order to display the present form and nature, and, in some degree, the extent of the arts and manufactures of the United States, the substance of the returns of the marshals and their assistants will be presented in the form of tables, in the third and fourth parts of this statement. In submitting this body of new evidence, it is necessary to state, that the information it contains is of various dates, in the last five months of the year 1810, and that it relates to the whole national population of that time, being 7,239,903 persons, of both sexes, and of all colors, ages, and conditions. Though many of the officers and assistants have performed this new and difficult service with great zeal and intelligence, yet various causes have concurred to occasion numerous and very considerable imperfections and omissions in returns from cities, towns, and villages, townships, hundreds, and counties, and as to valuable branches and articles, from States, to be observable. In these first sets of tables, it has not been thought best to supply these by estimates, which might be erroneous and sanguine. It was observed that there were some instances of goods of a doubtful nature, or which could not be considered as manufactured, in so material a degree as to entitle them to be placed in the class of "manufactures." These have been separately exhibited, but are considered as sufficiently relative to the subject of the statement to render these imperfect returns of them useful both to the various departments of Government, and to those who are engaged or propose to enter into the manufacturing business.

* The diminution of manual labor in Great Britain, by means of machinery, in the cotton business, was estimated, in the year 1808, at 200 to 1. An able writer and artist, (Mr. John Duncan of Glasgow,) considers it to be much more.

PART II.

A collection of additional facts, tending to show the practical foundations, actual progress, condition, and establishment of the American Arts and Manufactures, and their connexion with the wealth and strength of the United States.

In the tables which form the third and fourth parts of this statement is contained the result of this first attempt of an extensive and populous country, or perhaps of any country, to ascertain, in detail, the facts which constitute and display the actual condition of its manufactures. The duty was additional and secondary to the periodical enumeration of the people, and required a longer period of time than was allowable for such an enumeration, enjoined as a basis for the distribution of Constitutional power. The period of the two measures was not sufficient for correspondence between the superior and subordinate officers, which would have produced more perfect details and greater uniformity and perspicuity. It may, however, be affirmed, that the tables contain a great number and variety of clear indications of the state of the manufacturing branch of the national industry, and a mass of positive evidence upon the subject, in relation to the Eastern, Northern, Middle, Southern, Atlantic and Western sections or grand divisions of the country, with respect to the forms or modes of the manufactures which have grown up, the raw materials upon which they operate, a very considerable portion of the value to which they have arisen, very useful data for the comparative value of internal commerce or manufactures, and external commerce or navigation and foreign trade, and much elucidation of the operations of manufacturing industry upon the commercial and the landed interest, and upon the public safety.

From the official papers on which the tables are founded, and from many other sources, some additional information, not reducible into regular columns, has been collected, which it is now proposed to submit in the form of statements, concerning several branches and denominations of manufactures, and the connected machinery. To show the importation of manufactures in the first year of the present Constitution, the substance of the return of that year of ordinary trade, will be added. The national population was then nearly four millions of persons, and the value of foreign manufactures was about fifteen millions of dollars. Some of the non-enumerated or unspecified goods were certainly not manufactures, but their value is not considerable, and may be fully allowed for by the deduction of $295,688 98, which has been made from the amount of the return. Distilled spirits were not included among these imported manufactures. If our population be taken at seven millions and a quarter in 1810, our demand for foreign manufactures might be contemporarily estimated at $27,187,500. But, on the one hand, importation has been increased in consequence of a freer consumption, and the business produced by increased wealth and other circumstances. On the other hand, the consumption of foreign manufactures has been diminished by the great increase of those of the United States. The exportations of manufactures, in the year 1807, are afterwards given, so far as they appear on the face of the general custom-house returns; but it is considered as a certain fact, that a greater value is exported than appears from that document.

A very great number and variety of literary productions, foreign and American, diffuse the knowledge of labor-saving machinery, processes, and devices, and quicken the progress of manufacturing industry and skill. Those which favor family or household manufactures are peculiarly interesting. It is respectfully suggested, that it would repay the expense and pains, if measures were taken, under known public authority, to ascertain and exhibit, by plain descriptions or specifications and engravings, the best set of implements, instruments, utensils, and machinery, existing in the United States, to render household manufactures more and more easy, expeditious, convenient, economical, and profitable. The fly shuttle is considered as a very valuable invention, but, though it has been known in this country many years, more than ninety-nine hundredths of our shuttles are not of that description. The same observation occurs as to spinning mills, mules, jennies, &c. The stocking loom, though so much more rapid in its work than the knitting needle, has not been yet, by any means, sufficiently extended. It is more convenient, in a private family, than the smallest cloth loom, or the great spinning wheel.

It is necessary to observe that several facts, in the first part of this statement, will be found in this second part. They were given in the former, on the ground of the general economy and policy of manufactures, merely to show their influence in favor of agriculture, commerce, the fisheries, and defence. In the following statements they are adduced in a strict practical view, to manifest the state of the respective branches of manufactures and of the specific means of their execution.

Digest of Manufactures.

Cotton.—This raw material being the only redundant one produced in the United States, adapted to the manufacture of cloths for apparel and furniture, and being the most susceptible of labor-saving operations, the cotton branch will, probably, become, very soon, the most considerable of our manufactures. It is adapted to all seasons, in its various forms, and to a greater variety of uses than any other cloth or stuff: While sheep's wool continues to be much more wanted, cotton wool will be proportionably used as a substitute for it in blankets, corduroys, velvets, and the chain or warp of goods, with woollen wool or filling. Cotton goods can be printed—an operation seldom performed on woollens or silks—never on hempen goods. They are substitutes for worsteds or stuffs of combed wool, and for silks, which are made of raw materials, not yet considerable in the United States. The cotton raising States are the most numerous employers of family looms. Improvements in the household carding machinery, spinning machinery, loom and shuttle, and in family bleaching and dying, are producing new and great facilities, savings, and profits, in the manufacture of cotton goods by the farmers and planters. The cotton cloths, for various uses, manufactured in the United States, exceeded in measurement, in the year 1810, all the other cloths, that is, all the cloths of flax, hemp, wool, and silk; and the progress of the cotton branch is greater than any other, and, indeed, greater than that of all the others. Capitalists can most easily extend themselves in the cotton manufacture, because the material is abundant, and capable of being conveniently and promptly increased. The United States have some palpable and great advantages, over their foreign rivals, in the cotton branch. Those of Europe depend upon foreign agriculture for the raw material, for the indigo dye, and, in a considerable degree, for their bread stuff. Those in the East Indies will not be allowed, or be able, to use labor-saving machinery. Improvements in the looms, and other things, are opposed by force in Europe. The expenses, costs, and charges of transporting cotton from the farms and plantations, even near the coasts of the United States, to the manufactories of Manchester, Glasgow, and Rouen, and the same charges upon the manufactured goods from Manchester, Glasgow, and Rouen, to the houses of the planters and farmers in America, are equal to fifty per cent. upon the European costs of the finer, and seventy per cent. upon the coarse, heavy, and bulky goods of those great manufacturing towns. Every person capable of working in manufactories of woollen, linen, hempen, and silken cloths, can become, in less than a week, a good cotton manufacturer. The cotton branch, in the United States, is the great resort of all unemployed cloth manufacturers, and there is here no impediment to a person's changing his trade or employment, or place of business. Every man and woman in America, uncharged with crime, is free of every city, town, borough, village, hamlet, township, hundred, and county, and enjoys the freedom of every occupation, trade, and calling. The chief American bark and other dyes, and particularly the costless dye, called the iron liquor, made by covering useless fragments of that metal with vinegar or the pyroligneous acid, are convenient coloring for cotton yarn and cloths. A great desideratum in the manufacture of cotton is a method of giving it a true scarlet dye, which no art has, hitherto, been able to fix in goods made of this raw material. It has been, for many years, the subject of an offer of a very considerable premium in Europe. The Americans make good red cotton for the weaver, superior to Turkey yarn.

In consequence of numerous and particular inquiries and communications, in and from all parts of the United States, it satisfactorily appears that the skill, the means, and the scale of the year 1810, in the cotton manufacture, have been very greatly improved and extended, and that the capital, machinery, and establishments, have been very much enlarged and multiplied. The cotton blanket, which is a luxury on the continent of Europe, is a matter of great economy in the United States. It is an excellent covering. The double twilled cotton cloth, for apparel and furniture, begins to rival the immense invoices of foreign ticklenbergs and other stout linens. Similar facts occur in a variety of other instances. Heavy cotton goods cannot be imported without a loss. Fancy goods offer the greatest profits, and, in many instances, are easy of imitation. In household manufactures, as soon as it happens that the stock of flax and wool is exhausted, the industry of very great numbers of families of the Middle, Northern, and Eastern States, is applied to our redundant cotton, which is everywhere for sale, and pays no import duty or excise. Every additional working hour, in a day thus employed, is an addition of one twelfth part to the domestic manufactures of the country. It is highly beneficial to possess an unlimited raw material, which, at once, invites and impels to sober, steady industry, and facilitates its operations. One natural effect is, to render every industrious female an artisan, whenever her household duties do not require her time. The general practice of manufacturing cotton in families, not resident in the cotton raising district, prepares those families, by their habits of industry and their skill, for that extension in the woollen manufacture which the rapid multiplication of sheep must very soon occasion.

A large quantity of cotton is used as chain or warp, with woollen wool or filling, and it is used as wool or filling for goods with flaxen or hempen chains or warps. It has nearly superseded the use of flax in the manufacture of hosiery, and is, sometimes, mixed with wool in making stockings. Cotton is well adapted to use, in stockings, in our Southern winters. It is believed that it would be favorable to health if the colored laborers were supplied with a cap of thick undyed cotton swan-skin, similar, in form, to the highland woollen cap of North Britain. Fevers, and morbid strokes of the sun, would be prevented by the protection of the head.

Wool.—The manufacture which is next in rapid improvement and extent to cotton, is that of wool. It is very considerably aided by the new carding and spinning machinery; by the introduction of the merino, Barbary, and long-woolled sheep, by improvements in the breeding and tending of the general flocks of the country, by superior care of the growing fleece, by the increase of the value of the carcass or mutton, by the sorting of wool, by improvements in the stocking and cloth looms, by the acquisition of the fly shuttle, and of machinery to dress and finish cloths, by increased skill in the workmen, and by improvements in the arts and business of fulling and dyeing, to acquire which, great exertion and expense are applied.

The present growth and production of English wool is supposed to be most accurately estimated by Mr. Luccock, of Leeds, in his late publication. It is believed to decline. The soil is insufficient for the population. He estimates it at ninety-seven millions of pounds per annum. If the whole quantity of the United Kingdom be taken at one hundred and twenty millions, and if two third parts be used by the British and Irish people, it will give eighty millions of pounds for sixteen millions of people, or five pounds per head, whether infant or adult. This is exclusive of foreign wool and the increased cotton substitutes. In the same proportion, the United States, if they contain at this time eight millions of persons, would require, were our climates as cold, forty millions of pounds. If it be considered that half our population lies to the southward of Pennsylvania, and that their cotton is a very convenient substitute for wool, it would appear that forty millions of pounds weight of sheep's wool is a good supply. It is believed, from the facts stated and considerations suggested on the subject of wool, that the supply of 1812 does not fall short of twenty to 22,000,000 of pounds. Not only have sheep been multiplied, but their fleeces have been increased in weight, and much better preserved. A very few years must increase our wool to forty, fifty, or sixty millions of pounds, when the exportation of woollens must take place; for it is not doubted that our housewives, manufactures, and machinery, will continue to make up all the wool our sheep will yield. The stocks of fine-woolled sheep in Spain and Portugal are unhappily diminished, neglected, and injured, as well in the fleeces as in the bodies of those animals. Our principal source of European supply of fine wool is then reduced in quantity and quality, while prices are advanced. Our own stock of fine wool is therefore the more convenient and beneficial, and the manufactory of it is the more highly encouraged and greatly assisted. The most strenuous and judicious efforts to increase the quantity and quality of our wool have occurred within the two or three last years, while our adventitious gains of sheep and wool have been far greater than in any past time. Yet, the manufacturers, with their machinery, have so increased and extended as to advance the prices of wool, and even to produce continued importations. Considerations of revenue, at least, have occasioned the actual encouragement of increased duties, in the last year. The simplicity of the prevailing colors in the woollen branch, for some time, has been favorable to the United States, and continues to be so in the present state of their woollen manufacture. Scarlet, purple, garnet, crimson, claret, maroon, and pea green, are more difficult to dye, fix, and finish, than drabs, bottle greens, grave mixtures, and browns. Several extensions of the woollen manufacture, produced by interruptions from Europe, and by the increase of wool, are particularly convenient to this country, because they do not require the aid of the fulling mills, and may therefore be executed in families, and by manufacturers within their own working places. Flannels, common woollen stockings, and hats, are among the goods contemplated. These are commodities of very great consumption, and as necessary as any other woollen goods for the general population, and for the supply of the Army and Navy.

The spinning wheel, the loom, and the fulling mill, are real aids to manual labor. The two first have been long invented. The last is a far more recent discovery. It has been little improved since its invention. If nice skill in using the fulling machinery is of the greatest importance to the success of the woollen branch, it is very desirable to awaken the most particular attention of the manufacturers to this operation and mill. The fulling of hosiery is practised in Pennsylvania, in that description which is called the Germantown stockings. It particularly adapts them to the comfort and trying service of the Army. The fulling of hats is yet a manual labor. Wool, and other animal substances, are capable of being fulled. Vegetable substances are not deemed capable of that operation. The improved carding, spinning, and shearing machines, the house-cloth loom, and stocking-cloth loom, are all capable of saving labor. Dyeing saves the domestic labor and expense of washing, while it prevents all that injury to the pleasantness and beauty of woollen cloths, which frequent washing occasions.

No branch of manufactures receives so great an accession of foreign workmen as the woollen branch, because the raw material and manufacture are universal in Europe.

No branch of the manufactures of the United States receives so great a propulsion, from our immense landed capital, as the woollen branch; because sheep are produced in every section of our country. Cotton has a natural or climatical district, and requires a very limited portion of it. Wheat has a practical district. Hemp and flax are limited in their cultivation by the state of population and employment. All these require the steady labor of many hands. But the field of sheep walks is as extensive as our territory, and sheep farming is universal. It must become very extensive. They do, themselves much towards the care they require. The quantity of land which would maintain the greatest stock, to any country in Europe, is but a minor fraction of our soil. Wool, then, must become abundant, and household manufactures, machines, and artisans, insure the conversion of it, as fast as it will increase, into materials for apparel and furniture, and into other merchandise, for domestic and foreign trade and consumption.

Of all raw materials, none is capable of conversion into manufactures so favorable to health as wool. It is extensively and indispensably necessary to the enjoyment of that blessing. A great number of persons, of both sexes, and of all ages and conditions, require woollens for their comfort and their safety. There is no other good material for carpets; no other capable material for common hats and winter stockings; no other which preserves, in the human body, that constant, and equable, and insensible perspiration, the want of which brings early pain, disease, and death. No material for cloths, for furniture, and apparel, is so safe as wool in respect to fire. No abundant one, for these purposes, is so capable of economical and elegant colorings or dyes. Wool receives, and better than any other material retains, every tint, every shade of color. The goods of this manufacture are of very great variety and compass, beginning with three shillings sterling per groce of yards, in the shape of woollen bindings, and rising to fifteen dollars per yard, in the form of superfine broadcloths, of the best Peruvian or Vicunia wool.

Iron.—The red appearance, produced by iron, in our burnt clay, in every State and county, proves that character or quality of our soil. The ore is very abundant and widely diffused. The extraction of the metal in the best condition, the conversion of it into steel, and the manufacture of it into all the necessities and conveniences belonging to this extensive and useful branch, are facilitated by the omnipresence of wood, and, consequently, of charcoal, and by rich and numerous veins of fossil coal, appearing, in many places, on the surface of the earth. These are present magazines, and uncommonly strong symptoms of immense latent treasures of that fuel. The manufacturers of iron wares loudly call on the owners of mines of that metal to open more of them, and to work the whole upon a far greater scale. Machinery, to work up pig iron, has been wonderfully invented, extended, diversified, and multiplied, in this country, since the impediments, from the year 1750, from external legislation, ceased to exist. Every year enlarges and diversifies the iron and steel manufactures. They are much too numerous for a detailed statement. Castings have been made in very increased quantities. Those for the use of manufacturing machinery alone have been computed at one thousand tons per annum. The common blacksmiths' work, though of necessity very imperfectly given in the tables, is a branch of manufacture of great amount, and is performed in every section of the United States, however agricultural, and however peopled. The improvement of the system and tools of these workmen, and, particularly, the introduction of labor-saving machinery into their shops, would be a very substantial benefit to them and to the country. The blacksmiths' shops are, in effect, primary schools of the arts. The cut-nail machinery has been very beneficially introduced into some of these shops, near to the iron furnaces, insuring the profitable employment of all the time not otherwise occupied. It is like the two spinning wheels and the loom among the women in private families. The greatest nail-making State produces at the rate of nine pounds of nails for each person in the State; which is at the rate of sixty-five millions of pounds for the whole white population of the United States, were equal attention paid to this gainful economy of time and labor. There are many blacksmiths and nail-makers among the people of African birth and descent.

There being, in effect, no limit to our fund of charcoal, the extraction of pig metal from iron ore, the refining of iron by the second process, as also by the forge hammer, and other modes of compression, and the formation of it into manufactures, by all the operations which require it to be heated to the malleable degree, are, therefore, performed without any of the injuries to the metal, arising from fossil coal, and with all the benefits resulting from carbonic fuel. As the extent of our territory insures a very great duration to our stock of charcoal, by mere natural reproduction, and generally without the labor and expense of plantations, our iron manufactures must be very good, permanent, and highly beneficial. There are great quantities of iron adjacent to forests, which continue to impede the cultivation of the richest soils. Practice, the sciences, and imported aid and skill, add yearly to the degree of ability we possess in the iron branch. The rolling and slitting mills, the nail mill, the tilt hammer, the grinding and polishing mill, the wire mill, and all the great variety of iron works, except the common furnace and forge, were assumed to be prohibited by the act of the British Parliament of the year 1750, restraining the manufacture of iron beyond the pig and the bar. The iron and steel manufactures of Great Britain were raised in 1785 to the value of fifty millions of dollars. The United States formerly exported much iron, but they now import a far greater quantity in bars, and some rolled and slit. The returns of the quantity of iron manufactured are very imperfect, yet much is exhibited on the face of those documents. This branch has been very fruitful in inventions and labor-saving devices, both at home and abroad. In the moments when we feared difficulty and injury for the want of certain necessary things, the manufacture has been suddenly attained and established. This is remarkably the case as to common steel, iron wire, and edge tools, the manufactures of all which have been greatly advanced since 1810. The variety of iron goods returned by some of the States and counties, proves, to all who are acquainted with this country, that great quantities and values of the same kinds of goods are omitted in the returns from other States and counties. The improvement and extension of the cast-iron manufactures, including cannon, cast solidly, with a spruce head, and bored out, have been very great. The saving of the labor of the manual hammer, which is a chief benefit of small castings, and of the tilt and trip-hammers, have given extraordinary activity to this branch of the iron manufactory.

The course of things is very strikingly altered with respect to both the commerce and manufacture of iron. The iron branch is more extensive and perfect in Great Britain than in any other country. It is worthy of note, therefore, that considerable quantities of iron and steel are imported, even from that country, into the United States, proving our capacity to manufacture iron goods. The duty alone prevents much more considerable importations of British iron. The English iron manufactures were very extensive in 1783. But in each of the five years preceding 1800, they imported, on an average, 41,000 tons of bar iron. Many British workmen of their furnaces and forges have migrated to the States on the Baltic, and to other parts of the world, induced by the temptations of countries full of iron and wood. The scale upon which iron works have been lately conducted in Great Britain, the use of the steam-power, and the charring of pit-coal, have produced great benefits to the owners of iron works. Everything that saves, or which is equivalent to the saving of labor, in the business of the furnaces, is of peculiar importance to the countries possessing abundance of iron ore. The extension of our manufactures is not impeded by any want of the means to work it, when procured in the first simple state of pig metal. The extraction of metal from the ore involves much expensive labor. Much business is done in labor-saving manufactories, much in the common manual shops, since we can make the wire and working cards, and cannon, small nails, and anchors, spinning-wheel irons, and mill-work, screws, and ploughshares; and as we have raised the price of bar-iron from sixty to one hundred and ten dollars, since our Revolution, our capacity in the iron branch cannot be doubted. But the most weighty fact, respecting the state of our iron manufactures, is, that we cannot procure enough of pig metal and bars to satisfy the great and increasing demands of labor-saving mills and machines, and our numerous handicraft workmen. A principal improvement in the iron manufacture would be to make more valuable descriptions of goods, such as cutlery, fine tools, needles, watch-springs, and other nice wares.

Hemp.—The growers of this raw material are said to suffer very considerably from the sacrifice of the quantity and value of their crops, by imperfections in rotting and preparing it for the manufacturers. An injurious conversion of a great number of strong and good fibres into tow by the want of skill and care in the preparation of it for the spinner, too often occurs. This strong and harsh raw material is also rather unsuitable to the numerous class of female spinners and weavers. The labor of the culture, preparation, and manufacture of hemp, occasions it to be nearly excluded from the operations of household manufactures, in which respect it is on a less convenient footing than flax. Its great importance to defence obviously recommends hemp to the most particular attention and consideration. Its region, its soil, its seed, its mode of gathering, rotting, freeing from the stalk, dressing, keeping, spinning, weaving, finishing, and uses, merit thorough investigation, very intelligible specification, and extensive diffusion, so as to ascertain, preserve, and make known, all those things, with the best instruments of its culture, preparation, and manufacture, and the selection of its seed for propagation, oil-making, and all other uses.

In the spinning of hempen yarn, water and steam-mills have been introduced. In making twine, and even in making cables, horse machinery is used. The improvements in weaving are more likely to be successful in the manufacture of hemp than in any other raw material, from the great strength of the yarn.

No manufacture appears to demand, in a greater degree, the aid of joint stock, or associations of capitalists and manufacturers. It is possible that such companies might very favorably affect the cultivation of hemp, by purchasing it of the planter, in the state in which it is first separated from the root or ground, in the manner in which some of the Louisiana cane-growers sell to a sugar manufacturer, the stalks of the cane, as soon as they have been cut. Such divisions of labor have many favorable effects, and some particularly desirable in this country. When the manufacturer buys sugar-canes to make sugar, or hemp in the stalk, to rot and otherwise prepare, he in effect carries his manufacturing laborers into the present system of cultivation, by making them perform certain labors, which the farmer's people have hitherto performed. The manufacturer also brings his money earlier into the hands of the farmer or planter, and he saves him all the capital requisite for works, tools, instruments, and wages. The operations of the manufacturer also save labor, either by machinery, or by the superior skill and dexterity of those who follow one art or branch of industry. There is an useful reaction of all the adjacent arts and trades upon the neighboring cultivators, leading to care in all the parts of agriculture necessary to the production of excellent goods in the best condition. Our numerous flour-millers are ever checking the farmers who offer them bad kinds of wheat, or unclean, or mixed with rye or garlic.

Positions in the best hemp districts of the United States, where the strong nature of the soil tempts, or impels to the cultivation of hemp, and where fossil coal abounds, appear to be fit places to bring forward the manufacture of hempen cloths, yarns, twines, and all other goods which are convenient to handle, to store, and to transport; and which are not, like cables, and ships' cordage, liable to be injured by the tar used in their manufacture. By manufacturing hemp at the place of its growth, in such situations in Kentucky, the great and useless charges of transporting the offal, the tow, and the good hemp, in an unmanufactured state, would be avoided. The best part of the materials, increased in value by the costs and profits of the manufacturing, would better sustain the charges of sending them to the other States, or to the seaports, for the foreign trade. This raw material affords the strongest evidence of the absolute necessity of manufactures, and of adjacent manufacturers, especially by labor-saving machinery, to the prosperity of agriculture, and to the certainty of public supplies. Had we not cultivated and manufactured hemp, in the time of peace, we must have suffered for want of the manufactures in time of war. Measures, even to force such manufactures as are really necessary to the public safety, are not uncommon in the United States. A printed investigation into the cultivation, manufacture, and uses of hemp, with engravings, from the seed to the completion in cordage, cloths, and other supplies of war, by sea and land, would be of great public advantage. One foreign nation went into such a measure, and displayed before the people, in the most perspicuous manner, all the operations of forty arts and trades, most important to agriculture, war, domestic service, and foreign trade.* No country would be more promptly moved by such measures than the United States. The minds of the people are open to useful information, and those who receive conviction from such information are under no restraints of local or professional privileges. The freedom of trades, and the freedom of towns, as they exist in some countries, are deductions from the general freedom of the national industry.

Flax.—Habit, convenience, and necessity, especially without the bounds of the cotton district of the United States, occasion an extensive cultivation, preparation, and manufacture, of this raw material. The foreign countries which are most distinguished in this branch, have not yet made any considerable use of labor-saving machinery, and have few regular factories in which flax is prepared, spun, twisted, or wove. They have, until lately, depended entirely upon household industry for the preparation and spinning. In the United States, the branch has risen to its present considerable height chiefly by the same means. Within a few years, machinery, saving labor in a greater degree than the common spinning wheel, has been introduced into regular establishments, and even into private families; also machinery, to double, treble, and twist. There appears no reason to doubt that the flax manufacture will maintain a respectable ground in the United States, by the industry of common spinners and weavers, by little and great labor-saving machines, by the fly shuttle, and by some of the improvements of the loom. Such an investigation and display of all the operations and instruments of the culture and manufacture of flax, as have been suggested in regard to hemp, would be equally useful with a view to profit, though not so important to the defence of the country. The spinners and weavers demand of our merchants their constant aid in the importation of flax, for our cultivators do not keep pace with the wants and progress of the manufacturers; and in proportion as labor-saving machinery and capital shall be introduced into this branch, still greater exertions of the landed interest will become necessary. The household manufacture of flax is the most general, and the most familiar of all the family operations, relating to cloths for apparel and furniture in the United States. In consequence of habits so prevailing, all we can raise is manufactured, and all we can import. This branch also affords conclusive evidence that even handicraft operations will succeed in the household way.

Gold, Silver, and the finer-mixed Metals.—The increase of capital, with the consequent freedom of consumption and extension of manufactures and commerce, has occasioned goods made of these materials to be greatly multiplied, diversified, and improved. Gold and silver wares are made in all the considerable towns, and have reached a very high degree of convenience, excellence, and beauty, in some places. They are not only equal to every possible demand of the country, but our present workmen could make a stock of gold and silver wares, for foreign sale, equal to the quantity exported by any nation of Europe. With common care, the standard quality is good and uniform, the branch being in the hands of an intelligent and respectable class of citizens, and if it were chosen to raise the standard of quality in such inconsiderable degree as to make the silver plate a little superior to the purest foreign standard, and to establish an assay, the operation would probably be quite as pleasing to the conductors of this branch of our manufactures as it would be practicable and easy.

The use of rollers, and other contrivances, to save labor in some degree, have been gradually introduced into the gold and silver manufactory; but, being numerous, they have, though small, at length reached to a considerable aggregate importance. They would, indeed, be at this time highly convenient and valuable, did not taste and fashion, to the dominion of which this branch is peculiarly subject, render it unsafe to make a too large stock of goods, though exhibiting, in their forms, every line of beauty and of grace.

The goldbeater's trade, or that of the manufacture of gold leaf, has been recently introduced into the United States. The metal is prepared by labor-saving rollers, which reduce it to the thickness of a hard, tough, and very thin letter paper. Silver is similarly manufactured into leaf. The city of New York has attracted the most conspicuous and greatest number of these artists. It is understood that they are well established and prosperous. The workmen of Europe, in all branches such as this, are much incommoded by the fluctuations and distresses of that quarter of the world, and they now find encouragement here. This is the case with all that description of artists who are employed in making the more valuable metal ornaments, trinkets, set work, of glass, valuable stones, and paste, in gold, and silver, and jewelry.

Plated work, and the fine and common mixed metal buttons and buckles, are made in very considerable quantities, by foreign and native workmen. Casting and machinery afford them great assistance.

Button making has become a lucrative and regular employment in the United States, and is far more considerable than appears by the returns. The rollers for small and fine work are not sufficiently numerous and dispersed, or all the necessary supplies might be made with ease. The rolling and stamping apparatus greatly saves labor in button making. The American cast button is so cheap, that it can rarely be imported. Water mills and steam engines, to roll and stamp, in the manner of Europe, will quickly possess the United States of the entire manufactory of buttons, and other small metal goods, for seven millions and a half of people, with opportunities of free and unburdened exportation.

Hides and Skins of domestic and wild animals.—Every description and variety of leather is made here. So entirely and easily are the raw materials worked up by the tanners, leather dressers, and other manufacturers, that even the deer skin, which was formerly prepared in the buff mode only, is now much more frequently and extensively tanned and dressed as russet or colored leather. That species of skin alone has been heretofore exported in the unmanufactured state. Fine and delicate skins, which were not formerly known as raw materials, are now imported, and handsomely dressed, finished, and made up into ladies' shoes, pocket books, and other goods. The demand for skins, in this extensive and successful branch, has occasioned a curious and effective invention, to split skins, producing a double quantity of covers for books, and other purposes. The hog skin is tanned in some places, but it is too often neglected and lost, in the shape of mere offal of fresh, pickled, and smoked meat. Being particularly fit to make strong and handsome saddlery, the farmers will profit by attention to the best management of their hog skins, in all the States, as they now do in some. The proper oil of fish is not so abundant as it formerly was, nor obtainable in interior situations, without a great expense; and it is possible, that the congenial fat of the skin of this animal may occasion it to be better and more easily preserved than the skins of horses and oxen. A judicious course in manufactures is to consider the true fitness of the various materials, and to put each kind to its proper use.

The facility and utility of the manufactory of leather is everywhere such, that the utmost ingenuity has been exercised upon the subject of the sources of the raw materials, and the economy of them when manufactured. A considerable premium has been offered, by the French Government, for the invention of the best and cheapest substitute for leather, for the covers of books.

It would favor the Indian trade, which has a great tendency to conciliate the aborigenes, if the manufacture, and a greater consumption of deer skins, could be effected in our frontier towns. It would give activity to the Indian commerce. The transportation of dressed skins from thence, would not be subject to so heavy a rate of expense, in proportion to the increased value, nor would they suffer, in their substance, as they now do, from the worm, and from fermentation and decay.

The present and constant manufacture of all our hides and skins, affords the manufacturers an opportunity to devise and perform such things as, by increasing the beauty and goodness of their commodities, will enhance the aggregate value of their leather branch. Much utility and profit may be derived from superior tanning, coloring, dressing, workmanship, fancy, taste, and economy, in the whole range of the operations of the leather manufacturers. The elegance of our improved book binding is an example. The abundance of farm lands, and the distance of many of them from the seaport, render it certain that the United States will always be one of the greatest cattle raising and meat eating countries. Of course, there will be in our markets a great quantity of North American hides and skins. Bark, lime, and water sites, are, in many places, rarer incidents in country tanners' possessions and general situation, than things required to be specially sought, purchased, or hired. Whatever is properly made of leather, is a commodity of the most useful and durable nature. There are no commodities, the surplus of which will more certainly command a good and sure foreign market, than the manufactures of this raw material. As the nature of the country, and of many things in it, give a great fund of fixed and necessary capital in this branch, so it is true that there is a very large moneyed capital constantly employed in it. The Southern planters have, in many instances, made tanning a household or plantation business, which they may generally do with a little attention to the practice, and the addition of the pleasure of a little relative chemical reading. Were chemistry, in particular, and the general science relative to the fine and useful arts and manufactures, made a branch of domestic and academical instruction, it would greatly and permanently redound to the dignity of the American mind, and the solid internal profits of the business of the country. Such a course of instruction may be commenced at an early age: for exhibitions of this nature, internal compositions, mixtures, attractions, fermentations, and decompositions of material objects, are as amusing as instructive, and all these are pleasingly and intelligibly displayed in experimental philosophy.

It is believed that the present annual value of the leather manufactures of the United States exceeds that of any other nation, in proportion to the population, though the prices in America are lower, and the goods are nearly all of the useful and necessary, and not of the fine and showy character; and, as they are chiefly by the mere manual industry, and are not much aided in the domestic or household way, they establish our capacity for general manufactures in the ordinary modes.

Maple Sugar.—This useful and valuable commodity has been heretofore generally estimated as one which this country was rather able than likely ever to manufacture in a considerable quantity; yet, incomplete as manifestly are the general tables, in which eight only of the twenty-six districts return the maple sugar manufactured, and defective as are the subordinate returns from nearly all the States which have noticed the commodity, it is found that nine millions six hundred and sixty-five thousand one hundred and eight pounds of maple sugar are proved to have been made in the year 1810. It is considered that seventeen millions and one-half of foreign sugar, with perhaps three millions and one-half more, of maple sugar, supplied our consumption in 1790, when the population was four millions of persons. Four millions of pounds might be added for the weight of molasses used in substance. Our present population would, therefore, probably enjoy a comfortable but moderate supply of foreign and domestic sugar, in fifty millions of pounds of the crude or Muscovado, allowing, for obvious reasons, a freer consumption now than heretofore. It is not rare for careful, attentive families to make three or four hundred pounds weight in a season. If two hundred and fifty thousand families (of the one million two hundred and fifty thousand families which compose this nation) were to make only two hundred pounds each, or five hundred thousand of those families were to make no more than one hundred pounds each, we should have the requisite supply of fifty millions of pounds. The State of Ohio, with a population equal to about one-thirty-third part of that of the United States, returns three millions and twenty-three thousand eight hundred and six pounds of maple sugar. If the whole Union were to manufacture at that rate, it would produce above one hundred millions of pounds. Thus are the calculations of the year 1790 fully realized, though deemed then sanguine and fanciful. The preservation and general propagation of the sugar maple tree, therefore, very strongly press upon the public consideration. This substantial and energetic nation can effect, with ease, what the youngest member of the Union, in 1810, struggling with the forest and the savage, performed in mere ordinary course. The thorough investigation and display of this subject, from the natural history of the tree, through the course of exposure, seasons, treatment, management, and manufacture, till its formation into refined loaf sugar, and to the death and new plantation of the tree, with its qualities and various uses as wood, and with due attention to the implements, utensils, process in a manufacturing and in a chemical view, in all the possible details, appears to be earnestly demanded of the Government. This effort would induce its reward in almost every township, by the benefits which would result from the mere excitement of a general attention to the manufacture of so pleasant, so profitable, and so nutritious a production. To be fully and universally aware of an attainable advantage is, in such a case, to insure the attention necessary to obtain and preserve it. The season of making maple sugar is from the middle of February to the end of March, when the farmer and his family have little business to employ them. Five pounds have been stated as the produce of a tree; but if four, and even three, pounds be taken from each tree, on an average, seventeen millions of trees will produce fifty-one millions of pounds of sugar. There are frequently forty trees upon an acre of land; but, if there be only thirty-four, then five hundred thousand acres (a quantity of land inferior to very many single counties in the United States) will yield the whole necessary supply. The reserved wood lands of our farms is, on a medium, more than a fourth part, even in our old counties; wherefore, a tract of two millions of acres (of which three-fourths might be cleared for the plough) would fully suffice. This quantity may be considered as about one-thirteenth or fourteenth part of a State as large as the lands of New York or Pennsylvania, uncovered by streams and lakes. Our rough mountain land will produce this tree. It has been credibly certified, that a single township, in the State of New York, produced one hundred and fifty thousand pounds weight of maple sugar in the infancy, or seventh year of its settlement. It will be observed, that the manufacture is proved by the annexed tables, in Parts III and IV, already to take place in the Northern State of Vermont and in the Southern State of Tennessee, and in many parts of the intermediate country, establishing the region of the sugar maple tree and manufacture to be several hundreds of millions of acres. The tree is abundant in more southern districts. As it is at present considered necessary to impart to the wine of the Corinth or currant fruit a greater degree of the saccharine character than it has from nature, the general presence of the maple tree, and the universal capacity of our country to produce the red, white, and black currants, are facts apparently worthy of the public attention. Maple sugar, within my personal knowledge, has been so well refined as to have been served to the largest circles of foreign and American evening visitors at the house of the late President Washington. The quality was of that real excellence, which the double refined white loaf sugar (from the cane) of the late Mr. Edward Pennington, of Philadelphia, is generally known to have possessed. Information as to the proper quantity and use of quick lime, and some directions to avoid waste and injury in the operation of boiling, are the principal instructions wanted by our farmers and planters to make good Muscovado sugar from the proper kind of the American maple tree. While the Governments of Europe labor so incessantly to discover a vegetable production which will yield them sugar, we enjoy, from the gift of Providence, a great favor in the sugar maple trees which overspread our country. If we have but a limited quantity of cane land, it is happy that we possess very many more than the requisite number of sugar maple trees.

The substitution of this sugar for molasses, or the use of it when it reaches the condition and substance of molasses, is a further object to our country, which imports many millions of gallons of that commodity from foreign countries. With a view to the economy of drink, this is a most interesting consideration.

But sugar and molasses are so auxiliary to household preparations of various kinds, and to several great and small manufactures, and they are so acceptable to the great mass of our increasing population, that there is no reason to doubt that there might be a good market for all the sugar we can procure, not only from our canes and maple trees, but by the most active commerce. Consumption at home, and free exportation, will ever support the price. Sugars of every quality have increased in value throughout the world within a few years.

The Sugar of the Cane.—This interesting commodity is, in the United States, in the crude form, little more than an agricultural production, and, in its best refined condition, an elegant and grateful manufacture. After the acquisition of a cane district, by the purchase of Louisiana, it was apprehended that the Constitutional impediment to the importation of slaves would have at once deprived us of much cane sugar, which our newly acquired country would produce, and, in some degree, affect the prosperity of the Delta of the Mississippi. But the reported production of nine millions six hundred and seventy-one thousand pounds of the sugar of the cane in Lower Louisiana, in the year 1810, with one hundred and seventy-nine thousand five hundred gallons of molasses,* is considered as far short of what that country will be quickly made to produce, by the general adoption of the new and curious operations in the culture of cane and the manufacture of sugar, which are found to be practicable. The new course appears worthy of particular attention.

Instead of the employment of slaves, requiring a very burdensome advance of capital, and an expensive subsistence, the occasional labor of neighboring or transient hired white persons is often used to prepare the grounds with the plough and harrow, to plant the new canes, to dress the old ones, and to clear the growing plants from weeds. The same or other white laborers are afterwards employed by the planters to cut, and stack under cover, the ripened canes, so as to prepare them for the grinding mill and boiler. The operation of planting occurs after the sickly autumnal season, and before the vernal; and the operation of cutting also occurs in the healthy season, at the end of the following Autumn. The service is not, therefore, unhealthy.

It is considered to be expedient that the planters who own, and they who cultivate the soil, should not expend great sums in the establishment of mills and sets of works on all the sugar estates, after the manner of the West India colonies of the European States. But it is found more convenient and profitable to leave the business of grinding and boiling to one manufacturer of Muscovado sugar, for a number of planters. These persons, like the owners of grain mills and saw-gin mills, can be employed for a toll in kind or part of the produce, or for a compensation in money. By this method a tract of two miles square, or three hundred and twenty perches square, which will contain twenty-five plantations of above one hundred and two acres each, may be accommodated by one central manufactory of Muscovado sugar from the cane stalks; for none of the plantations will be more distant from the boiler than a single mile—a mere city portorage or cartage. Refineries, making white sugar, and distilleries, may be added, and the economy and accommodation to the planters will be more complete.

The effect of this division of labor and ownership will be rapidly to bring into the most complete and productive cultivation all the cane lands in the United States, and to advance the various manufactures of this valuable and wholesome agricultural production. The easy and cheap maintenance of cattle, the abundant supplies of provisions and building materials for man and beast, and the redundancy of fuel and cask lumber, with the benefits to our planters from being more frequently and comfortably their own stewards and overseers, will greatly redound to their convenience and profits. The exemption from duty on their Muscovado sugar, their refined white sugar, their molasses, and their rum, is a very great advantage to the manufacturers of and from the brown sugar and molasses of the United States.*

Wines of the Grape.—The proper wines of the grape, of the best qualities, are those produced in various climates which are found in the United States, if reliance can be placed upon the indications of temperature which I have ventured to suggest. To the kinds of that liquor which have been mentioned, the celebrated wine, called Tokay, may be added. It is produced near a place of the same name, situated in Hungary, in 49° north, in a temperature approaching to that of Champagne, one of the best wine districts of France. This situation may be considered as nearly corresponding with that of the country around the common point of contact of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania. The exquisite wines of the Cape of Good Hope, particularly the red and white Constantia, which are produced in 34° South, a position deemed colder than the same latitude North,

* There were made, also, 239,130 gallons of distilled spirits out of 239,130 gallons of molasses, in Lower Louisiana, in the year 1810.

* It is understood that the sugar cane has been successfully cultivated on the coast of Georgia, within thirty or forty miles of the ocean.

may be also added. The Madeira produces there an excellent wine.

It has been understood, within a short time, that some enterprising and well informed emigrants from Germany, after careful experiments, have considered the temperature of the southwestern corner of Pennsylvania as suitable for the production of the Rhenish and Moselle qualities of wines. This fact contributes to support the opinion, that it will be safe to count the degrees and minutes of common temperature in Europe and North America, respectively, from Lisbon and St. Augustine or New Orleans.

It appears by the returns, that about ninety-six quarter casks (a quantity of good red wine worthy of notice) have been made by a few Swiss settlers, from the Madeira and Cape of Good Hope grapes, on the river Ohio, in about 39° North latitude, in the Territory of Indiana. It is also understood, that a good wine, really fit for table use, has been made in the vicinity of Columbia, in South Carolina. Other experiments have been made, with various success.

The grape vine of several distinctly different species is indigenous in the United States, and is found in every degree of latitude, from the river St. Croix to the Gulf of Mexico. It is, doubtless, from such original stocks, in corresponding temperatures of Europe, that its several present excellent wine grapes have been obtained by selection, choice of position, and soil and cultivation. The skill of the wine makers, resulting from practice, and improved by the relative arts, has curiously perfected the manufacture of wine. This commodity rewards, by profit and pleasure, the skill and exertion of its improvers. A striking difference, very interesting to the United States, occurs in the characters of certain great classes of foreign wines, extensively used in this country, a statement and attempt to explain which may contribute to improve the future operations of the wine makers of the United States.

It has been constantly observed that, although the superior red and white wines of France (the Burgundy, the finer Clarets, and Champagne, and the Sauterne) are proved by the hydrometer to be as strong as some, and stronger than others, of the wines of Spain, Portugal, and their wine islands, (the Sherry, the Pacharetta, the Lisbon, the Carcavella, the Madeira, the Teneriffe, the Fayal, and the St. Michael's,) yet the French wines can only be kept in bottles well corked and sealed, while the latter are constantly kept upon tap, in half emptied casks. It is also observed, that, within a few hours after the uncorking of a bottle of French wine, especially of any of the superior qualities, it becomes sensibly bad, while these white wines of Spain, Portugal, and their islands, remain good, and some of them even improve in decanters, which by accident have remained long unstopped. This difference is considered to be occasioned by the fact, that the spirit of the French wine is its own natural and proper fermented spirit, while the Portuguese and Spanish wines have, in addition to their fermented, infusions of distilled spirits or brandy. The French wines, soon after their exposure to the air, by the drawing of the cork, are believed to recommence fermentation, and are quickly injured, having been before sufficiently and most perfectly fermented; while the distilled spirits in those wines of Spain and Portugal, prevents a similar recommencement of fermentation and its consequent injuries. Distilled spirits have no sensible fermentation.

Believing in this cause of the difference between those two great classes of wines, and deeply impressed with the importance of that difference, in several views, I submitted the facts, in a guarded and informal conference with the President, Vice Presidents, and several other learned and judicious members of the American Philosophical Society, at one of our meetings, in a manner which led to suggestions of the moment, from the gentlemen, respectively, in order to attain a knowledge of the cause; and, after hearing the whole, that which I have stated was also submitted to their consideration, and was received with as much assent as the nature of the learned body and of the subject rendered proper and necessary, on a new and informal communication. This matter is introduced here as the foundation of a suggestion, that, in the wine making business of the United States, in internal situations, where bottles may be costly or unattainable, a cautious infusion of the barely necessary portion of homogeneous distilled spirits (the purest and best brandy of the grape) will, probably, enable our citizens to keep their wine as they keep those of Lisbon, Xeres, Madeira, Fayal, and Teneriffe, in half empty casks and common decanters. Thus, not only a great and universal economy in respect to bottles may be made, but the practicability of keeping wines, in a condition fit for use, may be extended to all situations, and to every store keeper and family. Hitherto the manufacture of fermented liquors has been impeded, by the expense of bottles, and often by the total want of them.

As the grape and its wines and essential salt (known under the name of cream of tartar) are of very considerable importance to our interior country, which must receive foreign wines at costs and charges, which a great majority of the people cannot sustain, and as wine has a high value as an inducement from distilled spirits and as a medicine, besides the value of the fresh and dry grape, it is a matter of real consequence in this statement, that the success of the wine manufacture appears to be rendered certain, by the variety and universality of native grapes, by a number of successful experiments, and by the correspondence of temperature between parts of our country and the districts of the Tokay, the Champagne, the Moselle, the Rhenish, and the Hock, the Burgundy, the various Clarets of Bordeaux, the Sauterne and Grave, the Oporto, the Lisbon, and other superior or estimable wines of the European continent, and those also of the Cape of Good Hope. Extreme heat does not appear necessary or even favorable to the happiest concoction of the juices of the grape, the orange, and fruit in general. France, not less distinguished for its various and exquisite fruits than any other country, has no point more Southern than 42° 26' North latitude. In considering the character of Madeira and its wines, it will be remembered that it is a small and elevated island, and similar considerations, as to temperature, arise, in regard to the Constantia vineyards, at the Southern point of Africa, the Cape of Good Hope, which must greatly partake of insular characteristics.

Other fermented liquors.—The moralizing tendency and salubrious nature of these manufactures, recommend them to a serious consideration, and particularly in our country. Distinct views of those of the wines of the grape, customarily, and of the currant or Corinth fruit, have been submitted. Beer, ale, porter, cider, and perry, manufactures of great aggregate importance to the farmers, remain for notice. The difficulty and expense of procuring a supply of strong bottles, and a peculiar taste for lively or foaming beer, which our Summers do not favor, have been principal causes of the inconsiderable progress of the manufacture of malt liquors, compared with distilled spirits. The absence, or the infrequency of malting, as a separate trade, has also operated against brewing in the small way, and in families. The great facility of making and preserving distilled spirits, has occasioned them exceedingly to interfere with the brewery. The liquor of peaches, hitherto deemed incapable of use without distillation, greatly prevents the use of beer in a very extensive region of our country, where the peach tree grows with the freedom of a weed, and where its fruit is of the best quality. Cider, which is abundantly produced in another very extensive region, rivals fermented malt liquors, as a common drink, and a material for a customary concoction (the cider royal) and for distillation.

A method to preserve beer, and other fermented malt liquors, on tap, in half full vessels, by peculiar constructions of the casks and the cocks, has been invented.* The manufactory of glass bottles is likely to continue to increase. The cork tree might be established in all our climates south of the Chesapeake. The manufacture of wire, for securing the corks, is commenced with abundant capital in several places. The sealing materials for bottled liquors, are cheap in America. The manufactures of the brewery are diversified in the shapes of porter, pale ale, brown ale, strong beer, and small beer, to suit all tastes, and to accommodate all climates and consumers. The want of a head, or top of foam (or cream, as it is popularly called here) is now known to be observable in the tap beers of Europe, and it is presumable that this object of fancy, or taste, will not, therefore, be in future deemed indispensable in the American tap houses and families. We have been used to consider the want of this foam as an evidence of badness. The brewery must be expected to improve in the United States, as it manifestly has, since the introduction of the pale ale and porter manufactures, in 1774. The exportation of malt liquors, and their coasting transportation and sale, have been very much increased.

So great inducements from the cultivation and production of grain arise from the cultivation and growth of raw materials, including cane sugar, and from the very increased attention to sheep, and horse, and cattle farming, that the great farmer's manufactory of cider must extend, increase, and improve. The high price of flour, also, diminishes attention to grain liquors. The first qualities of cider are more valuable than the inferior wines are to the cultivators of France, the Azores, the Balearic isles, the Greek isles, the Canaries, and other wine countries. Cider is particularly convenient to those States whose settlements are completed, as it requires the use of but little land, and not the exclusive use: for orchards admit the cultivation of the ground. The distillery in those fully populated States, is chiefly from apples, to the north of the Delaware. The preservation of cider, without the expense of bottling, is more practicable and more general than that of fermented malt liquors.

The exquisite and various flavor of the North American peach, in the most favorable situations, and the ease with which it is propagated in such places, give rise to great solicitude, that nice and careful experiments should be made of the quality of the clear fermented liquor it would yield. Whether the attempt would succeed best, if the peach were treated like the grape, the apple, and the pear, in making wine, cider, and perry, or whether it would best succeed, if the fruit were treated in the manner of the currant, experience would determine. In the former cases, proper grape wines, cider, and perry, are made of the juices of the grape, the apple and the pear, without water, and often without brandy in the wine; always without brandy in the farmer's cider, and in perry. In the case of the currant wine, brandy is sometimes added, and sometimes omitted; sugar is always added, on account of the acidity of that fruit. The peach would not require that addition. There seems to be reason to fear it may prove too saccharine. It ought, however, to be remembered, that the wine of France, called Frontignac, is of an extreme sweetness, with less pungency than the juice of the peach. It is possible, too, that the peach juice, fined, and with or without an infusion of brandy, might be preserved as a sweet, to mix with other things; it would probably require the bottle. The ease with which the peach is raised throughout the United States, and its application, hitherto, to the table, only in its fresh and dried states, and to the distillery, invite to endeavors to extend its utility. So copious an addition to our substitutes for cane sugar, in the form of a sweetening treacle, and of so exquisite a flavor, would be very valuable, if it could be rendered conveniently attainable.

The ancient fermented liquors, made of honey, call metheglin, and mead, are not mentioned in any of the returns, though they have been long made in the United States—the former in considerable quantities. They would fairly contribute to swell the aggregate value of our household manufactures.

Distilled Spirits.—Numerous and valuable improvements in this manufacture have been effected. By making spirits of sixth proof, (Jamaica rum and French brandy being only fourth proof,) the transportation of American distilled spirits, from distant interior places, is effected upon more favorable terms, according to the value, or a lower rate per centum. The empyreumatic oil is frequently and easily extracted by a patented operation, and the bad flavor of ill tasted spirits is taken off. The quantity of distilled spirits reported, is 25,804,792 gallons, equal to 234,589 puncheons, of about 110 gallons each, very far exceeding all the West Indian and South American rum, or spirits, and molasses, of every foreign Power. Our manufacture of spirits is partly from foreign and American molasses, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, wheat, and potatoes, but principally from rye, apples, and peaches. The comparative importance of this distillery will be more clearly understood, when it is known that the amount of all the rum and spirits imported from the British colonies, into England, in 1785, was 18,184 casks, of 110 gallons each. It is true, that there was a considerable exportation from the British West Indies to the United States, some to the Northern British colonies, and a little in other directions. But the American distillery, at present, very far exceeds the whole. It will certainly continue to receive considerable support from foreign consumption.

The unobserved rapidity of the growth of the grain distillery, combining with the extension of the brewery, and with the increased consumption of the various meals, by the manufacturers, and the modern cultivations of cotton and sugar, have greatly contributed to maintain the high prices of wheat and Indian corn: for, the rye and barley, which have been raised for the distillery and brewery, have employed a proportional part of the cleared land and labor of the country. But, as our objects of cultivation have increased in number, and continue to increase, and as grain will be raised in a less proportion, according to our population, and our manufacturers, cotton growers, sugar planters, and cattle farmers, will require large supplies, the original necessity for the grain distillery will decrease. Cider, and wines of the grape and currant, will, at the same time, increase, and will materially interfere with the grain distillery by their rivalry, and by their employment of a portion of our industry. The distillery of the potato is said to be very profitable and increasing, and the flavor may be improved by the extraction of the empyreumatic oil, in the patented manner, as very profitable, and as moralizing rivals of distilled spirits. All the other drinks, such as fermented malt liquors, cider, currant wine, perry, and grape wine, are respectfully conceived to merit a sanctioned investigation, and perspicuous display, for the use of the people.

Chemical Preparations.—This branch of manufactures has been a great source of profit in Holland, Germany, Great Britain, and France. Our rapid and very great attainments in it are evidences of the enterprise of our citizens in trade and business, and of their progress in science and useful knowledge. The sugar refinery, distillery, and brewery, may be considered as ancient and important parts of this branch; but the operations, to which reference is most particularly intended, are those of the proper chemist's laboratories, for drugs, medicines, tinctures, extracts, dyes, and pigments. These have been extended with great skill and profit. The works, the capital, and the talents, which are constantly added to this business, insure its permanency and success.

Soon after the acquisition of the Southern lead mines, establishments, to make pigments of that material, were erected, in one season, sufficient, with the new shot factories, to employ that portion of the addition which was likely to reach the Atlantic ports. Red and white lead and patent yellow are now made in very considerable quantities, and, operating with the other manufactures of the same raw material or metal, occasion a demand upon the miners and the merchants for much more than they supply. Besides these, a great number and variety of other preparations of paints, drugs, tinctures, extracts, &c. are constantly made, so as to interfere with the importations, in some instances, and to prevent them in others. The practitioners of physic, various artists, and builders, derive great assistance, in their respective operations, from these manufactures, and, by a selection of faithful makers, have it in their power to avoid those fraudulent and pernicious deceptions, which few importers can detect, and none can entirely prevent. It would be favorable to morals, to the public health and interest, and to the internal and external trades, if these and other manufactures, liable to adulteration, were required to be sold with evidence of the maker's name.

Bricks and Brick Clay.—There are very great quantities of brick clay, or common potters' clay, in the United States; and in numberless situations adjacent to abundant woods and forests, and frequently to fossil coal. These clays are very generally impregnated with iron, and, therefore the bricks, tiles, and potters' wares, usually become red when burned. The implements, utensils, and instruments, employed in the manufacture of bricks, have been considerably improved, so as to make very good and handsome work, with great despatch, saving labor. The pottery being effected by preparatory horse mills and turning machines, we save the time and work of the operators, and give regularity to the form of their wares. Twenty-two labor-saving projects have been offered in brick making alone. This beneficial principle thus frequently occurs in a branch which does not at first view appear susceptible of the advantage of labor-saving machinery. A horse mill might be made to turn a number of potters' forming wheels. Red hearth tiles, of a very nice quality, are made; the clay might be freed from extraneous matter, and prepared in moulds, plain, fluted, or figured, so as to be formed into tablets, facies, columns, pilasters, and other ornamental matters, of the same color as the general brick work. The marble now used for such things, would be left for other and more convenient or necessary purposes. The official returns of manufactures of bricks are everywhere very defective, and in most places these simple manufactures are entirely omitted. There is some exportation, and much coasting trade, in bricks and various tiles for masonry. The use of unburned bricks, and walls composed of large regular pieces of earth, and earth and sand worked into an adhesive state, with and without lime, has been adopted in some places. Bricks cannot be imported without a loss. The few that arrive are brought as ballast, and do not injure the American manufactory.

The Pottery.—The manufacture of ordinary ware, of common potters' clay, is very much extended in the United States. It is of great use in dairies, kitchens, larders, store rooms, sale stores, and manufactories. Crucibles are made in several places. Black lead is redundant. Some manufactures of potters' ware, of qualities fit to substitute for queens' ware, or British Staffordshire ware, have been established. The manufacture of the common potters' ware, of clay, which becomes red in the kiln, is capable of improvement, by judgment in the choice of clay, and skill in preparing it; also in the formation, glazing, and ornaments. Within a few years, more numerous, and better veins of potters' clay have been discovered, in consequence of the attention to manufactures, than had been observed during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which have elapsed since the settlement of North America. The spirit of improvement in every branch of internal industry, affects the establishment of manufactures as rapidly as the ascertaining and making known the suitable qualities of materials, in convenient situations, take place. Every kind of fuel is abundant, the clays are not deficient, and some workmen arise, and others arrive among us, from various countries. The freight, cost of packages, breakage, other charges and losses, on potters' ware, are very great.

The lead colored potters' ware, often called stone ware, is also made of clay, and salt, and pot ash. It is of the same kind which was formerly imported from Holland, at a very great expense. This manufacture is from a clay which does not become red in the kiln.

As the establishment of potteries has succeeded in the Atlantic counties, it cannot be doubted that they will be more beneficial in the interior and western districts, where fuel, grounds, and building materials, are cheap, and where the breakage and expenses of transportation of foreign ware, over land, occasion the prices of the unbroken to be excessive. It is affirmed, in the strongest manner, by persons of judgment and skill, that the requisite clays and flints for the branches of the pottery, called English china and queens' ware, are very far beyond any possible wants of this country, for internal consumption or exportation. The Vermont clay is held in much estimation.

There is no manufacture for which this country is now more perfectly prepared than for those of potters' and glass wares, nor is it probable that the progress of any other manufactures will be henceforth so rapid; the consumption is very great and increasing.

Glass.—The manufacture of glass has made, till of late, a slow but considerable progress. It has been, however, astonishing, that an article so costly in the importation, so much subjected to loss by breaking, in the importation and in the transportation over land, and so universal in its consumption, has not made a rapid progress in the Western and midland, and even in the Atlantic sections of so well-wooded a country, so full of the materials. Wood fuel, and consequently alkaline salts, are to be procured with a profit, because the lands from which a glass manufacturer or potter should take them, would be greatly increased in value by the removal of the wood. The diffusion of the knowledge of this art by examination, statement, engravings, and instruction, would produce much gain in the United States. Our inexhaustible stock of wood actually cumbers much excellent soil, and suspends its cultivation and production. Fossil coal is abundant in several extensive districts. Large tracts of land, convenient to the materials, covered with wood, and accommodated with water, are purchasable upon very low terms, and on even long credits.

Seven of the States and districts made returns of twenty-three or more glass manufactories, in 1810, making glass of materials lying everywhere on the surface of the earth—a vast proportion of which is unused. The amount of goods made was $1,046,004. When this fact is considered, and the encouragement given to manufactures by the state of things since 1810, by the new duties, and by the war, it cannot be doubted that the necessary and convenient part of the glass manufactory is rapidly becoming sufficient for our consumption. The whole value of the British glass manufactory, in the year 1783, was considered to be $2,800,000 for eleven millions of people; yet they exported considerably to Ireland, their colonies, and to the United States. It appears that our glass works in 1810, were far more numerous and productive than was then supposed. New works have been since erected. There are great savings and large profits to a number of the American glass manufacturers, arising from their obtaining buildings, materials, fuel, and produce, from the lands they purchased, at very low prices, for those works, and from the sure and steady increase in the value of lands so purchased in the United States. The constant improvement in the style of the buildings in this country, the erection of houses in new towns, and on new farms, the extension of these into interior situations, the improvement of the glass manufactory itself, and the export trade, assure to the glass manufacturers in the United States, a good, steady, and increasing demand.

Digest of Manufactures.

It is manifest that the United States have made great progress in the manufactory of fermented liquors, and it is believed that their lessened proportioned attention to the bread grains, in consequence of the cotton, tobacco, sugar, and indigo cultivations, horse, sheep, and cattle farming and mining, will occasion more future activity in the brewer's, farmer's, and housewife's manufacture of fermented liquors, which will greatly increase the demand for glass bottles. Many old and new branches of manufacture also demand large numbers of those vessels. Our increasing population requires a constant addition. We have not yet discovered any considerable quantity of tin, which is one of the materials to make pewter, and our Summers incline the people to use glass drinking cups, (which are indeed preferable, from their facility to be quickly and nicely cleaned) to any other drinking vessel. The people of this country will, therefore, always be great consumers both of the useful and elegant glass wares. The importation of hollow glass ware, and looking glass plates, is extremely expensive, especially to the inhabitants of the interior.

Silk.—The steady and increased application to the prevalent household manufactures has prevented any considerable attention to breeding silk worms. Our manufacture of silk, from the immediate production of the worm in America, is very small. It is chiefly from foreign silk, and foreign silk thread; which last is wrought into fringe, tassels, buttons, and other fancy goods of taste and fashion, and is used in making up clothing and furniture.

The most interesting manufacture of silk for the United States, is that of bolting cloths for our flour mills. There are no difficulties in the way of procuring enough of the raw material to manufacture this necessary class of silk goods. It is true that importation may be expected certainly to furnish the quantity of those cloths which we shall want. But the peculiar value, or rather the indispensable necessity for this commodity, renders it desirable to hold it up in the most striking point of view. Holland, without any particular advantage over us in the manufacture, and in some respects less prepared for it than we are, has been induced, probably by her numerous flour mills, and the profits she derived from the manufacture of bolting cloths, to enter into it in a greater degree, in proportion to her population, than any other nation. The general silk gauze manufacture, of which this may be considered as a branch, has very much declined; so that experienced weavers might be drawn to America in any requisite number. The necessary importation of raw silk can always be made, if other objects should continue to employ private families. The infirmaries on the Southern estates, which have been already mentioned, would be convenient places for breeding silk worms. The climates of our region of colored population are those of the great silk countries, and persons well enough to move with comfort may tend the silk worm. Connecticut has done much in the production of the proper mulberry tree and of the silk, as well as in the manufacture of cloths of silk, though in a colder climate than those of the worm in Europe and Asia. This worm does well in dry countries. From such facts our capacity in the silk business may be considered as common to a great number of the States.

It appears that countries so successful in commerce and manufactures, and parts of those countries so populous and extensive, prosecute with such steadiness the production and manufacture of silk, that the subject must be worthy of a more profound and minute examination, than has yet been applied to it in the United States. Between the Southern extremities of Italy, Greece, and Spain, which, being peninsular, are probably of the warmth of our State of Louisiana, to the latitude of Presburg, in Hungary, which nearly corresponds in temperature with that of Baltimore, in Maryland, are found the innumerable silk worms of France, Spain, Hungary, Germany, Switzerland, Lombardy, Italy, and Turkey. In most of those countries, the merchants, the manufacturers, and the householders, pay a great and increasing attention to the production and commerce of unmanufactured and manufactured silks, of every description and quality. Similar facts occur in the corresponding climates of Asia. In many of those regions of the ancient and modern manufacturing and trading nations, the production, manufacture, and commerce, of silk, have been pursued through a long series of ages. They are maintained at the greatest known height, at the present time, when rival productions, manufactures, and trades, constantly employ an immense mass of capital and population. It is true, also that there are, or have been, in Great Britain, the whole of the Netherlands, and many parts of Germany, which do not produce silk, very considerable manufactures of that raw material, which they import from Italy, Turkey, and India. These facts satisfactorily prove, that the production of a surplus of silk is profitable in some countries, and that the manufacture of that surplus is found to be advantageous to other countries, which do not produce that material. The Governments and people of the United States cannot observe without impression our constant importations of foreign silk goods, in parcels, amounting, sometimes, on board of a single vessel, to six hundred packages. There does not occur to recollection any employment so suitable for the decrepit, the valetudinarian, and the aged part of the national population. It appears, also, to be compatible with the pursuits of all persons who rarely go abroad, and with those of such as can make it convenient to remain generally at home. Silk is so easily and abundantly producible, that it is found to be the most economical clothing of the poor of China. It requires no ownership nor tenancy of soil. There are some prepossessions against the production of silk in the United States, but the pursuit of it has been so long continued in many countries, and the results are so considerable, that it is much doubted whether the subject is correctly estimated. A complete examination of it, throughout its districts of foreign production, manufacture, and commerce, with the relative examinations in our own country, with the proper application of the whole, would be a useful service.

Salt.—The manufacture of salt, from springs in the interior country, is very imperfectly returned. New York is understood to return about 300,000 bushels per annum, and it is represented that the quantity can be increased. The Ouabache Saline made, in 1809, about 130,000 bushels, of which there is no return. Other salt springs have been discovered on the banks of the Kenhawa. The manufacture of salt, (and that of glauber salts, which are procured in the progress of the work,) on the seacoast, is considerable and increasing, and has been very favorably affected by a recent discovery. The flowing of the sea near to Cape Henlopen, in the Delaware State, occasions a collection of salt water in a great sandy pan, or extensive shallow cavity. In this cavity the evaporation of much of the water appears to take place, while the remainder is absorbed by the sand. This occasions the saltiness of the absorbed part to be much increased. That briny water is subject to further evaporation, till it reaches a clayey bottom, which lies under the sand. By uncovering this clay bottom in places, and making short trenches in it, opportunity is given for the evaporated water to pass into them. When taken in vessels from these trenches, the water is found to be strong enough to float an egg, and of course produces a much greater proportion of salt than the common sea water. Sometimes this water from the trenches is converted into salt by mere evaporation. On the French Atlantic coast, such clayey bottoms occur in the salt district, and are highly valued.

It is said that such great pans, or shallow cavities, or receptacles of sea water, are numerous along the coasts of the United States. They ought to be brought into immediate use, as in Europe.

The salt works at Cape Henlopen are stated to produce nearly 2,000 bushels per week, or 100,000 bushels per annum. Only a small part was reported in 1810 in the Delaware return. It is believed that the increase has been so considerable as to amount to the quantity now mentioned. This new advantage in salt works may not only occasion a great extension of the manufacture, but may produce savings of labor and fuel. It is possible that situations remote from the mouths of great rivers may be most favorable for salt works, as the sea water is perhaps less briny where a great body of fresh water is disembogued. Islands are found best on the coast of Europe. It may not be amiss to consider the temperature of places, on that coast, where salt is manufactured. Cadiz, Lisbon, and the south of France, (no part of which is less than 42° and 26' North,) may be considered as the great sources of salt on the continent of Europe. The coasts and islands of Georgia, and the shores of the Gulf of Mexico, appear to be much more favorable for the manufacture of salt than the southern districts of France, and situations upon the Gulf seem more likely to be suitable than the vicinities of Lisbon and St. Ubes, so far as depends on temperature. Long droughts and a climate of a general dry character must favor the manufacture. Fuel in abundance can be procured in America, where the manufacture by solar heat is not yet found to be practicable.

It is probable that the manufacture of the best pearl ashes, out of the common ashes produced by fires of the salt makers, might conduce to the profits of salt works. It ought to be remembered that the ashes of the pine and all other terebinthine woods are considered as unfit for the ordinary manufacture of pot ash.

Other wholesome and agreeable antiseptics are substitutes for salt, and are sufficiently relative to a competent manufactured supply of salt to merit suggestion. A considerable portion of brown or unrefined sugar, or of molasses, rubbed on meat intended to be pickled, or coarse sugar or molasses, mixed with the salt and water in certain proportions, with or without saltpetre, is known to contribute to preserve meat, and to prevent its growing hard. This is a well tried fact, highly interesting to everybody, when salt is scarce and dear, and it is peculiarly so to the owners of sugar maple lands. To this method of saving salt, or lessening the demand for it, may be added the adoption of the practice in Canada, and in some parts and families of the United States, of placing meat in a situation to be frozen, and to be retained in that state while it is kept, in Winter, for family consumption. Ice houses have the same effect upon the economy of salt, in the warmest seasons, and merit the consideration of the farmers. They are built of logs from our woods, below the surface of the earth, and of logs and a very thick and close thatch, above the surface, for a very small value of labor, and less of materials.

It is a good operation, in manufactures, to make substitutes for such things as cannot be obtained in sufficient quantities. If, therefore, maple sugar and maple molasses shall be made use of to perform a part of the antiseptic and preservative operations of marine salt, and are, as we know, of a less scorbutic tendency, it is a great point gained. To make salt less necessary, by the use of the maple or cane sugar, or molasses, by freezing meat, and by ice houses, is equal to the effect of manufacturing salt in greater quantities.

It may be useful to remark, that the parts of the coast of France where the greatest quantities of salt are made, by the operation of the sun, are the coast of Brittany, Sainteuzé, and the country of Aunis, the most northern of which is of the temperature of our Virginia coast. They manufacture salt by fire, as far north as the mouth of the Seine.

Cannon and Muskets.—The quantity of iron cannon wanted has not, for a long time, been a matter of any difficulty to procure; the price being stipulated, so as to induce to the undertaking, the commodity is obtainable with certainty. It has been already mentioned, that the most approved practice is to cast them in the solid manner, with a spruce head, which, it is supposed, occasions a more perfect formation of a compact piece of ordnance, and is considered as conducting highly to its goodness, at and near the muzzle. The gun is then set in machinery, which turns it with a pressure towards a fixed instrument; this bores a calibre in the solid gun-form mass of iron, with great exactness and beauty.

Cannon are constantly manufactured, when demanded, to a very considerable extent, in the public armories of the Union, and of the States, and on contracts, and for sale to associations of citizens, and to individual purchasers, for use at home, or for exportation. Of these very considerable operations, there are some specific returns for 1810, under the heads of "gun makers," and "boring-mills," and it is presumed there are some included under that of iron foundries. The public armories, and their manufactures, are not particularly noticed in the returns; they are mentioned, as of 1810 also, in your report, in part.

The improvements in the manufacture of steel, and the experience in the general manufacture of arms, with the exigencies of the times, and above all, the evidences from the operations of individuals, of the States, and of the Union, under various administrations, that the expense and trouble of a judicious and rigorous inspection are required to be surely and effectually provided for, have made favorable changes in the condition of this important branch of our manufactures. But it appears highly worthy of consideration, whether, after a proper notice, military guns or pistols should be allowed to be sold, without the evidences of the inspection of a sworn and responsible officer. These are manufactures which obvious considerations require to be placed under a regimen, so well devised, and so strictly executed, as to prevent deception, and its most evil consequences. The numerous facts which have occurred fully prove that unfaithful, or unskilful, or at least insufficient work in this branch, is confined to no time, no place, no nation, no cost.

The Fine Arts and the Sciences.—The works of human genius and cultivation, which belong to the elegant and magnificent class of the arts, have a very considerable effect upon the convenience, utility, and profits, of those things, which are usually called manufactures.

A knowledge of architecture is necessary even to the cheapness of construction—geometry, which is the scientific basis of architecture, teaching the operator that, as a square contains the largest area within a certain extent of uncurved outlines, so the walls of a square building are less costly than those of any other right-lined edifice. The strength of the arch is taught in like manner. An analysis of beauty instructs us in the grounds of ornaments of curved lines.

The fine arts, particularly painting and sculpture, have beautified the manufactures of alabaster, marble, clay, plaster, and metals, and of wool, linen, cotton, and leather. The fine porcelain of France and Saxony, the statues and paintings of Greece and Rome, the modern imitations of them in paintings, statues, and casts, the elegant miniatures of alabaster, its various flowers and ornaments, the improvements in the composition and in the pottery of wedgewood, the imitations of the antique vases and figures in various gold and silver ornaments and utensils, and indeed of brass, the tapestry of the Gobelines, embroidery, brocading, dying, engraving, and the printing of linen, cotton, and silken cloths, are among the numerous examples that crowd upon the mind. The fluctuations and disorders of the Old World have occasioned innumerable transfers of the instruments, the libraries, the models, the works, the agents, and the lovers, of the fine arts, from thence to the United States. This truth is as simple, absolute, and well known, as the transfer hither of merino flocks, and of manufactures of fine wool, from their proper original countries. The effects of such transfers of much that was necessary for the interesting cultivation of the fine arts, either in their distinct and separate character and form, or as pleasing and beneficial auxiliaries to the useful arts and manufactures, are manifest to the attentive observer. A numerous body of professors and instructors, in music, painting, sculpture, architecture, and all the other branches of human skill and industry, of a character, in their respective arts and sciences, very far indeed above the colonial schools, and such, in numbers, in standing, and in talents, as nothing but the agitated state of Europe could so early have induced or driven hither, are seen in all our principal cities. Even by the musical branch, light as it may appear to many, the useful arts have been improved. The manufacture of every instrument, from the organ to the fife, involving considerable science, exempts us from the costs and expenses of importation, and the exhibition of the Panharmonicon has diffused instruction, in an electric style through every attentive mind, gifted with mechanical talent, or opened by education, in that branch of knowledge.*

The advantages of military architecture, by land and sea, are perfectly obvious. It involves much and various art and science. Our display of skill in construction for the naval department is not surpassed, whether it be tested by promptitude of exertion, shortness of voyages, exemption from foundering, preservation from the dangers of a lee shore, safety in retreat from a superior foe, forcing an adversary into action, or the all-important workings of our ships of war, throughout the time of actual engagement. The construction and equipment of a ship require much art and science. They involve the use and benefits of the curious mystery of the magnet, those of the discovery of the compass, the science of chemistry in regard to the generation, refinement, and composition of nitre, the purification of sulphur, the preparation of carbon, and the adjustment of the whole; the doctrines of matter and motion, and of pneumatics and projectiles; the principles and practice of geometry and mechanics, sculpture in the formation of the head and ornaments—a beautiful, extended, and peculiar symmetry; and various other matters in the fine and superior arts and sciences.

The improved state of our manufactures, with their buildings, materials, ingredients, compositions, instruments, and mechanism, involves a knowledge and a practice, in wide circles of the fine arts, and of nearly all the sciences.

In the branches of sculpture, the United States exhibit some works of merit, and of greater promise. In the useful part of the engraving department, our progress has been rapid and considerable, because there is a demand for the works of the artists. It has been accompanied by invention, evincing genius. In the ornamental and elegant part of sculpture, enough has appeared to prove that we have the art, if occasions shall draw it into frequent action. In wood, there are very honorable evidences of native talent, in various works of taste and fancy, and there are numerous works of that material in the statuary branch. In our marble, we exhibit some specimens, by foreign artists, far beyond the quality of the materials. The United States may claim eminence from the works of its native and adopted sons, in the various branches of the art of painting, and the superior works of civil architecture.*

Instruments and Agents of Manufactures.—Machinery and processes to effect manufactures, so as to leave the manual industry of a nation for other employments, are of a degree of importance to the United States proportioned to the smallness of the average population on a square mile of our extensive territory. As we possess innumerable horse-powers, applied to digging and raking machines, to turn up and break the soil, and cover the seed grain, under the names of the plough and the harrow, to our incalculable profit, so we have water mills and steam engines, in numerous instances, and of diversified forms, to manufacture boards, bark, powder, flour, bar and sheet iron, nails, wire, carded wool and cotton, yarn and thread, metal plates of every kind, hair powder, snuff, gunpowder, paper, muskets, scythes, bolts, stocking web, various cloths, and printed and other goods. These and many other machines have been obtained from abroad, or derived from the actual and very considerable talents of our own citizens. The complicated silk mill, the first invention for yarn or thread, the fulling mill, and various other mechanical constructions, were acquired by the most extensive manufacturing nation of this time, in Europe, from her neighbors. The wisdom of the world has been, and is, attainable by us, as by other industrious and qualified nations, and the inventive genius of the people of the United States has produced a very great number of curious and valuable instruments and machines.

Various important processes enable us to tan and color skins, brew, distill, rectify, refine, exact, combine, and separate the raw material or manufactures of the United States. The sciences and the fine arts, and the useful arts and manufactures, beneficially co-operate to obtain, what would be otherwise unattainable, or attainable with much labor and expense, and less perfection. In this department, foreign sources, the knowledge, and, indeed, the learning and talents of our citizens have yielded to the country vast benefits. Chemistry has rapidly become a very general study. Leather, glass, distilled and fermented liquors, drugs and medicines, dye stuffs, pigments, and all the metals, and the numerous preparations of them, all the salts, all the oils, and all the extracts, tinctures, spirits, and decoctions, with many other things, belong to this class.

It is in this country, as much as in any other, that the civil and religious freedom of the citizens enables them to display the value of, and effectually to use, those strong and various abilities and qualifications for different employments in life, which Divine Providence has imparted to the human mind and body. Such faculties for certain pursuits, when not used, are talents held in an unproductive state. To have kept Rittenhouse and Franklin in the usual employments of agriculture, would have deprived the country of the unparalleled planetarium, and of the safe conductor of the electric fire. But the history of such a man as Galileo presents the obstacles these eminent Americans would have encountered in some countries. It would have been a mine of wealth lost to the country if the talent to invent the saw gin, to prepare cotton for the manufacturer's card, had not been exerted, and if the inventive and fabricating powers of our citizens' minds and bodies had not been applied to steam enginery, to the machinery for nails, to rolling and slitting mills, to card-wire making, to carding, spinning, and weaving machinery, to fulling mills, to manufactures of grain, and other ingenious occupations, the curious merits of which are lost in familiarity.

It is a truth of the utmost importance, that there are now in the United States working examples, intelligible models, books of instruction, and qualified workmen, foreign and native, by means of which persons in almost every fine and useful art and manufactory can obtain good instruments, machinery, information, and assistants, to make and conduct valuable establishments for every raw material. The tables prove how extensively these things were diffused, so long ago as the Autumn of 1810. Since that period, a very rapid progress and a much wider diffusion in the useful arts and trades have certainly occurred.

Many curious and valuable inventions and improvements have taken place in the mechanical and chemical branches, and in the system of labor and political economy. Every month, every week, produces additions to them. Among these are distillation by steam, the pendulum and lever mill, the machine for splitting skins, the pressed nail mill, the great increase of chemical preparations, for dyers, colormen, and manufacturers, the conversion of fossil coal into a pigment, the cask for preserving fermented liquors on tap in sound condition, weaving machinery in several new forms, the manufacture of edge tools, from rolled steel, various improvements to save fuel, the variations and extensions of the application of steam, the manufacture of opium from the common red poppy and from the lettuce, the increase of the pharmaceutic preparations to the number of seventy, the division of labor in the cultivation of the cane, activity in the manufacture of the currant wine, the tanning of deer skins, activity and ingenuity in the substitutions for wool, by the manufacturing of thick and warm cotton goods, and by cotton warps under woollen woofs, the machine for manufacturing dipped candles, the activity, extension, and improvement, of the sheep breeding and farming; the new employment of the children in the cities, boroughs, and villages, and the active employment of the females in general in manufactures, the extension and facilitation of communication between the producers and importers and the manufacturing citizens, by the various and unprecedented improvements in the Post Office Department, the extension of the funds of the manufacturers by many of the banks, which are solidly and rigidly founded, constituted, and administered, the introduction of new exotic raw materials, by means of commerce, and of laborers, artisans, and manufacturers, and processes of every branch from various foreign nations.

Foreign masters, as well as journeymen and foreign capitalists, have discovered that the United States afford extensive opportunities to employ themselves and their money in manufactures and the useful arts, as well as in commerce, navigation, stocks, banks, and insurance companies. These branches are as open to them here as are agriculture and the purchase of lands and houses in the most favorable States, or as they are to a native or naturalized citizen. Patented monopolies, processes, machinery, and tools, engrossed, for a time, by the foreign inventor in Europe, may, of course, be used here by all persons, without restraint or injury. In this high inventive and learned age these opportunities, in such a country as the United States, often redound to the great benefit of respectable foreigners, as well as to ourselves.

It has been attempted, by means of the marshals' returns, by a resort to other documents, by careful recollections, by observation, and by inquiry, to present in this digest such a statement of pertinent facts as appeared suitable to compose a body of convincing evidence, respecting the reality, the situation, the nature, the magnitude, the variety, the benefits, the materials, the means, and the tendencies, of the national manufactures. I respectfully submit a well considered and confident opinion, that this internal branch of trade has become, and will continue to be, productive of the most solid benefits to the land and other interests of the country, and to give very considerable extension to the navigation, fisheries, coasting trade, and foreign commerce of the United States.

It was believed that the design of the present resolution of the Legislature was to procure facts on which they could rely, and in the best form admitted by the materials; and not estimates, which might be partial, erroneous, and, from their nature, doubtful. Estimates in innumerable details would diminish the force the returned facts would possess, separately presented. When it was observed that a single county in Massachusetts reported 89,600 common sheep, that one other returned only 10,000, another 1,939, another 1,600, and that eight others, abounding in sheep, returned none; that the statement from New Jersey was still more imperfect, and that twenty-one States, Districts, and Territories, did not return their flocks; that there were but eight returns of blacksmith's work, from $3,998 to $1,572,627; that, though one State reported nearly two spinning wheels to a family, there were fourteen omissions to return such wheels, with a multitude of similar facts, a present attempt to estimate in complete detail appeared likely to wrap up the principles, and the quantities, values, and other facts, which the returns exhibit, in a volume of matter that would obscure or diminish their proper and natural impression, and give rise to inconvenient objections to the whole document. I am, indeed, of opinion, that the extensive local knowledge, and very diversified information necessary to a detailed estimate, which should extend to various cities, towns, villages, counties, and townships, defective in their returns, or entirely unreturned, cannot be claimed by any individual. But, since it has been the desire of the Treasury Department that the best estimate that can be made should be attempted, I have very carefully examined and compared all those things which are of a nature to afford a sound foundation for such an operation. The defects of the local returns, the importation and production of raw materials, food, forage, fossil coal, and wood fuel, and the possession of mill seats, manufacturing capitalists, white population, machinery, and native and foreign manufactures, have been duly observed and considered, and an estimate of the whole value of the manufactures of each State, Territory, and District, for the year of the returns, has been so accomplished as to satisfy my own mind, in a considerable degree, as to its total amount, and to occasion me strongly to hope, that the amounts for the States, and other sections, respectively, are not materially erroneous.

Considering that the manufactures actually reported by the marshals and secretaries of Territories extremely imperfect, as many of the subordinate returns really are, in quantities, valuations, and even in notices of numerous small and great known manufactures, amount to the sum of $127,694,602, after many goods have been deducted, which are not always classed, at least by commercial men, under the head of manufactures, I have ventured respectfully to offer an estimate of the whole manufactures of the United States, as worth, in the year 1810, $172,762,676. The facility of retaining and steadily extending this valuable branch of the national industry is manifested by its early and spontaneous commencement in every county and township and by its nearly spontaneous and costless growth, with such aids only as have not occasioned any material expense or sacrifice to agriculture or commerce, since they were chiefly incidental to necessary revenue, or resulted from our distance from the foreign consumers of our productions, and manufactures of our supplies. The comparative importance of the manufacturing branch in the business of the country, will be illustrated by the reflections, that the greatest value, in one year, of the exports of American productions and manufactures, has been $48,000,000, and the like value of the exports of foreign productions and manufactures $60,000,000, under very extraordinary and transitory circumstances, which may never again occur. Foreign and domestic exports, in the greatest year, having thus amounted to $108,000,000, a net profit of ten per cent. on the exports, and the same on the imports, being $21,600,000; a net freight of vessels, worth $45,000,000, estimated at ten per cent. outwards, and the same inwards, being $9,000,000; and the aggregate of these great national items of mercantile trade being $137,000,000, a comparison of the manufacturing and commercial branches of the national trade may be made and considered, and, as it is believed, without any probability of material or dangerous errors. Some confirmation of this view of our national operations, mercantile and manufacturing, may be drawn from the facts, that, in years of general peace and of regular and prosperous commerce, from 1785 to 1787, the average exports of England alone, with about 8,500,000 inhabitants, amounted to $70,000,000; while their manufactures were computed at 266,000,000 of like money. By means of this great foreign case, as stated for their legislative use, and by means of the case of the United States, as it may be found to stand, after the proper investigations, it is probable that expedient and equitable measures may be occasionally or systematically devised.

The public expenses, incurred to promote, accommodate, and protect commerce, however moderate, just, and necessary, have been very considerable, compared with those incurred to promote manufactures. A portion of the navy, the beacons, buoys, light-houses, and public piers, with a part of the diplomatic and consular establishments, have occasioned expenditures, which, however reasonable, expedient, and equitable, are for the proper benefit of commerce. Nothing, equal to this, has been done for manufactures. The mere interest of the aggregate of those commercial expenses, for a single year, would produce, it is believed, new and important lights, guides, and aids, to all who are politically, professionally, or incidentally interested in the subject of manufactures.

Such being the truth as to any past expenditures, occasioned by this branch of the internal industry, it is conceived to be a duty to state it, as a relative fact, subject to examination and consideration.

This suggestion appears the more interesting, when it is remembered that the persons who, at this time, compose the entire body of the American manufacturers, their assistants and families, with a just addition for those engaged in household manufactures and upon the estates of the planters and farmers, constitute the second class of the national population, in respect to numbers. They are native, adopted, and foreign; adults and minors; rich, substantial, and poor; male and female. Our Federal and State constitutions and laws secure to them the right to pursue their occupations, and to obtain comfort and prosperity, in common with the rest of the citizens and inhabitants. They are diffused through all the States, Districts, and Territories; all the cities, towns, and villages, and all the counties, townships, and hundreds. They are found in every vicinity, and even in most of the private families. They are a part of the constituents of every member of the Territorial, State, and National Legislatures and Administrations, and are of every church known among us. They constitute a great portion of the militia, contribute to fill the posts and ranks of the army, and are parts of its necessary organization in several of their proper arts and trades, appear in numbers on the rolls of the mercantile vessels, of the public and private armed ships, and of the workmen they carry to preserve them from injury or destruction, by accident, tempest, or battle. They possess and employ property, real and personal, to a very large amount, and greatly contribute to the public revenues of the States, and of the Union, in the form of direct taxes, and duties on imports or consumption.

Opinions have been advanced in some countries, unfavorable to the morals of the manufacturers. But it does not appear that there is more vice among the description of persons indicated in the preceding paragraph, than in some other extensive classes of our population. Perhaps the smugglers, by violence and deception, are the most immoral description of persons of business in every civilized community. Their misconduct is, at the same time, most injurious to the country. The system adopted at the manufactory of Humphreysville, in Connecticut, with respect to education, manners, discipline, morals, and religion, is an interesting evidence that the people of the United States may quicken and increase the virtues of the rising generation, and reform the degenerate of later years, by a humane and politic system in the large manufactories. It may be correctly observed, that, while no commotions have dishonored the reputation of the manufacturers in this country, from this class of our citizens there have risen Nathaniel Greene, Benjamin Franklin, and David Rittenhouse, respectfully conceived to be comparable, without disadvantage to their respective memories and to their manufacturing brethren, with any equal number of ornaments and benefactors to their country, of any other single profession or occupation. The field of manufacturers, represented, in other parts of the world, to be fruitful in mischief and turbulence, has produced here a body of firm supporters of our constitutions and laws, and the most respectable examples of the civic virtues.

When it is considered that natural history unfolds the works of Divine Providence in the formation of our earth, of its productions, and of all its animated tenants; that chemistry displays their values, their relations, and their uses; general philosophy and particular geometry annually teaches man more and more to know the principles, the powers, and the laws, involved in the stupendous system of the universal frame; and when it is remembered that the arts and manufactures are the practical application of this extensive and precious body of human science, the branch of the national industry which has engaged the attention of Congress appears to be worthy of the most profound investigation and the most perfect display.

I have taken the liberty of detaining this statement to the last day permitted by your instruction, in the hope that, by the means which I had adopted, I should obtain additional information from several of the States, in the North and in the South, whose returns are manifestly and greatly defective. But none have been received. I therefore beg leave to conclude, with the remark that the form and details of the succeeding tables may facilitate the measures of the Government of the Union and of the States, in causing their officers occasionally to report further information, concerning particular branches, and respecting manufactures in general, with their raw materials, their means, and their instruments.

Submitting with perfect deference the preceding statement in all its details, I have the honor to be, sir, your respectful servant,

TENCH COXE.

To the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

In the course of the numerous and diversified operations, occasioned by the deliberate execution of this digest and statement, constant and very close attention has been applied to those facts which have occurred throughout the Union, since the Autumn of the year 1810, from which a judgment of the condition of the manufactures of the United States could be safely formed. It has resulted in a thorough conviction that, after allowing for the interruptions to the importations of certain raw materials, the several branches, and the States, Territories, and Districts, have advanced, upon a medium, at the full rate of twenty per centum, which would give an aggregate, for this year, of $207,315,211. In this increase, the State of New York is considered to have most largely partaken, especially by means of her joint stock companies. But, as it is best to make ample allowances for some repetitions of articles, which are inextricably involved in the subordinate returns, a sincere and well reflected opinion is respectfully submitted, that the whole people of the United States, taken, in 1813, at eight millions of persons, will actually make, within this year, manufactured goods (exclusively of the doubtful) to the full value of two hundred millions of dollars, or forty-five millions of pounds sterling.

JUNE 21, 1813.

[PART III consists of a series of tables of the several branches of American manufactures, exhibiting them by States, Territories, and Districts, so far as they are returned in the reports of the Marshals, and of the Secretaries of the Territories, and their respective assistants, in the Autumn of the year 1810; together with similar returns of certain doubtful goods, productions of the soil, and agricultural stock, as far as they have been received.—These tables are entirely too voluminous for publication in this work.—Editors.]

UNSETTLED ACCOUNTS.

[Communicated to the House, January 31, 1814.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, Jan. 28, 1814.

SIR: Conformable to a resolution of the honorable the House of Representatives, of the 30th of July last, requiring the Secretary of War to lay before the House a view of the unsettled accounts in the offices of the Accountant of this Department, and of the Paymaster of the Army, and to suggest measures to secure the accountability of public agents, and to prevent the accumulation of unsettled accounts connected with the War Department, I have to report, that a satisfactory view of the unsettled accounts in either of these offices has not been, and (agreeably to the enclosed statements of the Paymaster of the Army and of the Accountant) cannot be, rendered by them, within any definite period of time.

The better to secure the accountability of public agents, and to prevent the accumulation of unsettled accounts, I have the honor to "suggest"—

1st. That an office be established, in which all accounts, whether in specie or in kind, connected with the Military and Indian Departments, shall be adjusted, audited, and settled, conformably to rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Treasury Department; and

2d. That, to render efficient the pay department of the Army, which is now but adapted to a small and peace establishment, and to secure the regular and punctual payment of the troops, a new organization be adopted, to consist of a Paymaster General of the Armies of the United States, with such deputy, district, and assistant paymasters, as the exigencies of the service may require, neither of whom shall belong to the line of the Army.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

The SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

Unsettled Accounts.

ARMY PAY OFFICE,
City of Washington, Jan. 18, 1814.

SIR: In the estimate which I had the honor of submitting to you for the compensation of clerks in this office, for the year 1814, I confined myself to the amount appropriated for the year 1813, under the impression that any increase which the public service might call for would be more properly brought to your view in the report which I was then about preparing. I have since thought, however, that it might as well be made the subject of a separate communication.

For the due examination and adjustment of the heavy and voluminous accounts of the several sub-paymasters of the army and militia, and of numerous recruiting officers, which are already rendered, and daily coming in, together with the current business of the office, I consider it my duty to suggest that an additional appropriation of at least 4,000 dollars, for compensation of clerks in the year 1814, appears to be highly necessary.

I would also beg leave to suggest the propriety of an appropriation of $1,547 22 for contingencies of the office, (1,000 of which on account of the year 1814,) for the purpose of paying for books, stationery, printing, fuel, and other necessary expenses, including a debt already contracted for those articles, for the use of the office, for the last six months of the year 1813, of $547 22.

The books, stationery, and printing, have heretofore (until the 1st of July, 1813) been paid for out of the general contingent fund of the War Department; but, if an appropriation be specifically made for those objects, as herein suggested, it will relieve the contingent fund of the War Department from them, relieve the officers of that Department from the settlement of the accounts, and remove the difficulties which at present exist respecting the construction of the laws on the subject.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT BRENT,
Paymaster of the Army.

Hon. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

ARMY PAY OFFICE,
City of Washington, Jan. 24, 1814.

SIR: I have been for some time endeavoring to make up a report conformably to the views of the honorable the House of Representatives, as expressed in their resolution of the 30th of July, 1813, and of your letter to me of the 4th of August last, but find it totally impracticable to make one by any means satisfactory to myself, or which would convey correctly the information which it would seem the resolution contemplated; and for the following reasons:

The debits and credits of the several sub-paymasters, recruiting officers, and others, who receive public moneys from this office, are constantly fluctuating; so also are the immense masses of accounts which are daily transmitted to it. Scarcely a mail leaves the city, east, west, north, or south, but carries with it remittances to the above-mentioned officers. Scarcely a mail arrives from any of the four points of the compass but comes loaded with their accounts and vouchers. Not a day passes over but some of them are examined and settled at this office; hence it will appear perfectly impossible to give anything like the true state of open unsettled accounts, and I must beg the favor of you to state these circumstances to the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means who introduced the resolution.

The letter which I had the honor of addressing to you on the 18th instant, is calculated for that part of the resolution which relates to measures tending to prevent the future accumulation of unsettled accounts in this office.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

ROBERT BRENT,
Paymaster of the Army.

Hon. J. ARMSTRONG, Sec'y of War.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
Accountant's Office, Jan. 21, 1814.

SIR: I duly received your letter of the 4th of August last, wherein you require to be furnished, by the 1st of November following, with a "statement of the unsettled accounts in this office, showing as well the amount of moneys which have been advanced by the Government, and the time when advanced or paid, as the amount of vouchers rendered by the individuals charged, the causes which have occasioned the delay of settling the accounts of the several agents and individuals who have received money from the appropriations made for the War Department, noting the time when their agencies or contracts expired, as well as the balances and amount of each now remaining unsettled." Since which my attention has been devoted to the accomplishment of the objects required; but such has been the great increase of the business of the office, that I have hitherto found it impracticable to furnish the statements; they are in a state of progression, and may possibly be completed during the present session of Congress.

In order to place you in possession of some of the leading causes of this delay, I will take the liberty to bring to your view the course that the business takes in its progress through this office.

It will be recollected that all the moneys appropriated for, and expended in, the War Department, are drawn from the Treasury, by warrants drawn by the Secretary of War, and countersigned by the Accountant, the amount of which, during the year ending on the 30th of September last, has exceeded nineteen millions of dollars. These warrants are all recorded in this office, and separate accounts kept of each specific appropriation out of which they are drawn, of which annual statements are furnished to Congress. The warrants thus drawn, are either for advances directed by the Secretary of War, or for balances ascertained on settlements made by the Accountant. For the advances, the persons receiving them are charged and held accountable on the books of this office, and the settlements are made in conformity to law and established regulations, or by authority from the Secretary of War. All these transactions are entered on the books of the office, and quarter yearly statements of them are made out, and the accounts accompanying them transmitted to the Treasury for examination and revision.

In the prosecution of these duties it will readily occur to you, sir, that, where the expenditures of the Department exceed so far in amount those of ordinary years, the business of accounts must necessarily increase in a correspondent degree, even if the system according to which the business is transacted, were as well calculated for the one as the other. This I cannot avoid stating is not the case; and with the view of showing wherein the difference is most prominent, I will take the liberty of stating that part of the business in relation to advances and the manner they are now accounted for.

1st. As it regards the Quartermaster General's department.

It will be recollected that, by the acts of Congress establishing a Quartermaster General's department, the Quartermaster General is expressly exonerated from any responsibility for his deputies; the consequence is, that advances are made to the Quartermaster Generals, which they distribute to the several officers of their departments; these again advance moneys to others, and consequently, when one personal account is adjusted, it gives rise to a number of others, and in this manner the duties of this office, in relation to that department are increased to a degree more readily imagined than described.

2d. As it regards the recruiting service.

Officers commanding recruiting districts are furnished with money in advance, with which they are charged. These are branched out to officers of every grade in the army, with each of whom separate accounts are opened and settlements are required to be made at this office, and the same remark applies to this branch of the business, as it regards the number of personal settlements, as that made in relation to accounts of the Quartermaster's department.

3d. As it regards the Pay department.

The course pursued is, for the Paymaster of the Army to receive advances for the pay, subsistence, and forage, of the army, and for bounties and premiums, with which he is charged on the books of this office. His payments consist principally in advances to paymasters of districts, and to officers for recruiting. The district paymasters advance money to the regimental paymasters, and others, for the pay, &c., of the army, and by this process, when the Paymaster of the Army exhibits his accounts for adjustment, their settlement occasions the opening of a multitude of accounts, all of which are to be ultimately settled in this office.

4th. Commissary General's department:

Advances are made from this office to the Commissary General of Purchases, and to every deputy commissary in service; separate accounts from each are received and adjusted at this office, to a very great extent; for, independent of the number of accounts which the advances are calculated to produce, the system directed by the act of the 3d March, 1809, by which every person has a distinct account opened under each specific appropriation out of which the moneys are advanced to him, the number of accounts which an agent of purchases, for instance, has open, amounts to ten or twelve, for each of which he renders quarter yearly accounts and vouchers, which are to be settled and entered on the books of this office.

When it is recollected that all these transactions are to be placed on record on the books of this office, that the accounts are all to be settled, the balances ascertained and paid, without any other examination than that which they receive at this office, I flatter myself that it will be found that all has been done which it was practicable to do with the force employed in the office, and under the circumstances above-mentioned, and that causes, not within my control, have prevented my complying with the contents of your letter within the time required.

I have thus, sir, mentioned some of the prominent features of the system, according to which a part of the duties of this office are performed, and some of the difficulties incident to that system. I could proceed to state the increased labor and time necessary to the adjustment of the great accumulation of personal accounts, the very great and increasing correspondence of the office consequent to that accumulation; but it will doubtless occur to you, sir, that, from what has been stated, some alteration has become indispensably necessary to the regular and punctual performance of the public business of this office; and the subject is accordingly respectfully submitted to you as the head of the War Department.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.

WILLIAM SIMMONS.

FOREIGN GOLD COINS—EXPORTATION OF SPECIE.

[Communicated to the House, April 12, 1814.]

BALTIMORE, March 4, 1814.

SIR: From the numerous calls for specie lately made on the banks of this State, and to the Southward, and which there is reason to apprehend will be repeated, great inconvenience must soon result, unless some measures are adopted to avert the difficulty of meeting those demands. The banks of this city have been, and still are, laboring under considerable inconvenience, from the circumstance of foreign gold coins not being a legal tender. They received those coins to a large amount, under an act of Congress which was suffered to expire, and are now unable to use them, notwithstanding the pressing demands upon them. A law giving some rate of currency to specie of this description, seems indispensably necessary, and would contribute materially to their relief.

Since the State of Maryland has been wholly deprived of commerce, the banks in the city of Baltimore have been gradually getting in debt to the Eastern cities, and payments are now required in specie, to an amount that will greatly exhaust their treasure; in the event of peace, the further demand for exportation will, it is apprehended, materially increase their embarrassments. In the latter point of view, the subject is peculiarly interesting to the banks of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, inasmuch as they have subscribed largely to the late loans to the United States. Nearly one-third of the banking capital of Baltimore has been thus invested; and if, on the return of peace, specie should be permitted to be exported, the necessary consequence will be, that the increased demand upon the banks will compel them to throw this stock into the market at a very reduced value, much to their own injury, as well as to the injury of the nation. And it may not be entirely unworthy of consideration, how far the prospect of exporting specie, at the close of the war, may retard, or the prohibition to export may facilitate, such loans as the Government may hereafter wish to make.

Under these impressions, therefore, we take the liberty respectfully to suggest to you the propriety of recommending to Congress, during the present session, to provide by law for giving a rate of currency to foreign gold coins, and to prohibit the exportation of specie for twelve months after peace shall be proclaimed.

In the hope that, if these measures shall meet your approbation, you will submit them to the President, or give them such other course as may in your opinion best promote the objects we have in view, we have the honor to be, sir, with very high respect and consideration, your very obedient servants,

REVISED STATEMENT OF PUBLIC DEBT.

[Communicated to the House, April 14, 1814.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 12, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a revised statement of the debt of the United States, accompanied by an explanatory letter on the subject, from the Register of the Treasury, by which it appears that, in the statement of the public debt on the 1st January, 1813, annexed to the printed account of the receipts and expenditures for the year 1812, the amount of stock constituted under the act authorizing a loan for the service of that year, was, by mistake, stated at eleven millions of dollars, instead of eight millions thirty-four thousand seven hundred dollars, the real amount of six per cent. stock issued by virtue of the act before recited.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

G. W. CAMPBELL.

Honorable SPEAKER

Of the House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Register's Office, April 7, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a revised statement of the "debt of the United States on the 1st January, 1813," as a substitute for the statement thereof, forming a part of the appendix to the printed accounts of the receipts and expenditures for the year 1812, presented a few days since, and transmitted to the House of Representatives of the United States.

The item in which the variation appears, is the extension of the sum of eleven millions of dollars, as constituted stock under the act for borrowing to that amount in the year 1812, and which had been calculated to the full amount; whereas the whole amount of the moneys borrowed under the authority of that act was only - $10,184,700

But as $2,150,000 therefore had been borrowed of certain banks, on contract, reimbursable in the years 1813 and 1814, this amount forms a deduction of - - - - $2,150,000

Leaving the true amount of six per cent. stock of the year 1812, of - $8,034,700

A sufficient number of copies of this revised statement has been struck off, not only for the present occasion, but also to be bound up with the appendix to be rendered with a similar statement for the ensuing year, for the purpose of maintaining the correctness of those annual exhibitions of the public debt.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOSEPH NOURSE, Register.

HON. G. W. CAMPBELL,

Secretary of the Treasury.

[Communicated to the House, January 6, 1814.]

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of sundry inhabitants of Maryland, on the subject of the patent granted to Oliver Evans, for his improvements in machinery employed in the manufacture of flour, made the following report :

That the memorialists complain that, by virtue of the act passed on the 21st January, 1808, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans," the said Oliver Evans claims the benefit of certain improvements in the machinery employed in the manufacture of flour, of which he is not the original inventor; that he exacts large and unreasonable sums for the use of those improvements; and that those are compelled to pay, who have established their improvements before the passing of the said act.

Your committee conceive it not only repugnant to the principles of a Government organized like ours, to permit a question of a character such as the first objection presents, to be litigated before the Legislature; but it is impossible that a fair decision can be made, when it is indispensable, in order to render impartial justice, that the parties should be permitted to go into evidence respecting the facts in controversy. A court of justice is the proper tribunal where such questions ought to be tried, and your committee are informed that this very question has already been settled in that way, by the circuit court of the United States for the Maryland district, favorable to the pretensions of the said Evans.

The second subject of complaint seems to your committee equally an improper subject for the interference of the Legislature. The patentee, by law, has an exclusive privilege to use his invention as he pleases. No person has a right to complain if the proprietor of an invention demands a sum deemed exorbitant, more than if such a demand had been made for any other species of property; it must rest with the purchaser whether his interest will permit him to yield to it.

The third ground of complaint is equally untenable in the opinion of your committee. The Legislature had the power (and it seems in this case they have exercised it) to subject those who should use the improvements mentioned, in future, to the claim of the said Oliver Evans. The patent originally granted to him had previously been declared void by a judicial decision. The case, therefore, stood as if no exclusive right had ever been granted, and it is certainly not necessary to prove that a person who uses a new improvement before a patent is granted, is subject to the restrictions which follow the grant. Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolution :

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorial ought not to be granted.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

Your memorialists humbly beg leave to represent, that your honorable body, on the 21st day of January, 1808, passed an act authorizing the Secretary of State, on application, in writing, by Oliver Evans, to cause letters patent to be made out in the manner and form prescribed by the act entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose;" thereby granting to the said Oliver Evans, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term not exceeding fourteen years, the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using, and vending to be used, his invention, discovery, and improvements in the art of manufacturing flour and meal, and in the several machines which he has discovered, invented, improved, and applied to that purpose. That letters patent did accordingly issue, which are now in full operation; and that, by means of them, the patentee is exercising a most grievous oppression over the citizens of the United States, and more especially over those who are immediately engaged in the manufacture of flour.

Your memorialists, in any ordinary case, would be the last to remonstrate against benefits which the Legislature of their country might think proper to confer upon any individual; but believing, as they do, that your honorable body, when you consented to pass the act of January, 1808, in favor of Mr. Evans, were deceived by artful representations of merit; and knowing, also, that Mr. Evans has used his patent for purposes in which it could never have been intended to give him aid, your memorialists feel confidently assured that Congress will not hesitate to reconsider the ground of their former grant, and to do impartial justice between Mr. Evans and the rest of his fellow-citizens.

Your memorialists have understood, and they have no doubt of the fact, that, when Congress undertook to renew Mr. Evans's monopoly, they were industriously made to believe that he was the inventor of all the machines for which he solicited and obtained his patent. In this your honorable body were grossly deceived. Many of your memorialists have just witnessed the progress of several trials that took place at the last term of the circuit court of the United States at Baltimore, in actions instituted by Mr. Evans for infringements on his patent rights. Although the result of these trials were such as must give alarm to every man who has dared to think of opposing this exorbitant monopolist, yet did they prove most incontrovertibly, by the investigations to which they led, that Mr. Evans was not the original inventor of any one of his pretended machines. Your memorialists entreat the patience of your honorable body, while they briefly detail the testimony relating to this question, such as it appeared before the circuit court, and such as it can again be exhibited, whenever your honorable body may think proper to require it.

The machines which form the subject of Mr. Evans's patent are the conveyer, the elevator, the hopperboy, and the drill. For greater perspicuity, we will state the testimony, as applied to each machine, in successive order.

1st. The conveyer. It was proved that Jonathan Ellicott, of Baltimore county, was the first inventor of this machine. He had erected it in his mill some time before the year 1786, and applied it to all its present uses. He showed it to Oliver Evans, who was highly pleased with its operation. He said it was all that was necessary to complete his machinery; that he had long desired to have such a machine, but could not devise one; and, finally, in consideration that Jonathan Ellicott would permit him to attach it to his elevator and hopperboy, Oliver Evans gave him a perpetual license to use these last.

2. The elevator. This machine has been invented nearly a century and a half. There are books, a hundred years old, that exhibit it, (applied to hydraulic purposes,) the same in principle, form, dimensions, and materials, with the elevator now claimed by Oliver Evans as his original invention.

3d. The hopperboy. A machine upon the same principle with Oliver Evans's alleged hopperboy, worked by the same power, acting in the same manner upon the meal, and producing the same effect, although not as beneficially, was invented by — Marshall, of Delaware, and set to work in his mill, before the time of Oliver Evans's supposed discovery. Mr. Evans lived in the neighborhood of this invention.

4th. The drill. The invention of this machine did not come in question before the circuit court; but it is susceptible of undeniable proof, that Jonathan Ellicott, before referred to, was the inventor of it, as well as of the conveyer.

Thus it appears that Mr. Evans's merit, as an inventor, in no respect corresponds with the artful and imposing representations by which your honorable body were induced to grant him your protection for a second term of fourteen years. So far from having invented all these machines, he was not the original inventor of any one of them. Your memorialists, therefore, might here rest their petition; but they think it proper to notice the other grounds of Mr. Evans's pretensions. These are, first, that he has invented useful improvements in the structure of the several machines secured by his patent; and, secondly, that he was the first who applied to their new use in mills those machines.

The conveyer and hopperboy are the only machines in which Mr. Evans will now attempt to show that he has made any improvement; in the elevator and drill he has not made even an alteration. First, then, of the conveyer: The transverse flights form the alteration which he claims to have made in this machine. Even if Mr. Evans was the inventor of this alteration, its utility in the manufacture of flour is extremely questionable. Several most intelligent millers, who were examined upon this subject in the trials at Baltimore, were so much at a loss to discover the beneficial effect of this alteration, that they preferred the spiral conveyer. The great utility of this alteration is rendered still more questionable by the fact, that a large portion of the millers, even those who have paid Oliver Evans for the license of his patented machines, do not make use of the transverse flights. But your memorialists are convinced that Mr. Evans was not the author of this alteration. They will be able to show your honorable body that this improvement, like most of the improvements which Mr. Evans claims, was discovered by other persons, from whom he adopted it.

Secondly. Of the hopperboy. Mr. Evans, as has been before stated, was not the original inventor of this machine. Your memorialists admit that he was the first who added the ropes leading the horizontal arms around, and that this addition facilitates the operation of the machine. But, surely, it will not be contended that upon this alteration Congress bottomed their grant. This improvement may have been sufficient to entitle Mr. Evans, under the general law, to a patent for the improvement, but for nothing else. It could not have entitled him to a patent for other machines, which he neither invented nor improved; much less can it entitle him to an extension of his exclusive privilege beyond the usual term.

Your memorialists come now to the last ground of Mr. Evans's pretensions, "that he has the merit of having first applied these machines to their present use in mills." This ground was much narrowed by the trials before referred to in the circuit court at Baltimore. It was there shown that the conveyer, the hopperboy, and the drill, were applied by their original inventors to all the purposes for which they are now used. The elevator is the only machine about which there can be the least doubt; and, to the minds of your memorialists, there are conclusive reasons for believing that Oliver Evans was not the person who first discovered the application of this machine to its present office—the raising wheat and flour. Oliver Evans first exhibited his elevator, and first informed the world that he had invented one, in the year 1787. Twelve or eighteen months before this time James Strode, of the State of Delaware, had erected a perfect elevator in his mill.

Mr. Strode, in the circuit court at Baltimore, related the history of his invention. Standing in his mill, contemplating the machinery that he then had in it, he observed that, as the leather strap turning the fan performed its revolutions, the buckle, by which it was fastened, would catch up a few grains of wheat below, carry them up with it, and empty them out at the top. The thought immediately occurred to him, that a machine revolving like this strap, with buckets upon it, would completely perform the office of raising his wheat and flour. He constructed it accordingly, and found it perfect. This machine is what is now called "Evans's elevator." Your memorialists admit, that a brother of Oliver Evans declared in the circuit court at Baltimore, that Oliver Evans had several years before this period invented precisely the same machine; and that, although he did not show it to the world by using it in his mill, yet he had it, and the model of it was locked up in a chest, and continued so locked up for several years. When this testimony comes before your honorable body it will, no doubt, receive whatever credit, under all its circumstances, it may be entitled to. But your memorialists hope they will be pardoned for believing that there was some mistake in the matter.

Your memorialists have thus candidly detailed the testimony relating to Mr. Evans's patent. They feel assured that your honorable body will discover in it abundant cause to take this subject again into consideration. Your memorialists, however, will take the liberty of suggesting other motives of greater weight.

When Congress consented to renew Mr. Evans's exclusive privileges, in 1808, they could not have intended to give their law an ex post facto operation; yet such has been the construction which our circuit courts have felt themselves constrained to give to the act of January, 1808. In the circuit court of Philadelphia it has been decided, by Judges Washington and Peters, that even those who erected their machinery in the interval between the expiration of Mr. Evans's first patent in 1804, and its renewal in 1808, cannot continue to use them without a license under the second patent. The hardship of this construction is extreme. The United States abound with mills, in which the machinery was erected during that interval when no law existed to prohibit it; when no man was aware of any right still remaining in Mr. Evans; and when the public thought they were enjoying a property for which they had already paid the price. But, since this construction, persons, who erected their machinery under those circumstances, must either pull it down, or subject themselves to actions for treble damages; or they must consent to pay whatever price the patentee may choose to demand for a license. As it regards his charges, your memorialists humbly state, that the act of renewal has imposed no limitation on Mr. Evans, an omission of which he is availing himself most oppressively. During his first patent, while he was looking forward to his intended application for a renewal, Mr. Evans observed a very becoming moderation in his demands; thirty-three dollars was originally the price of his license to use his machinery in application to one water-wheel; but, as soon as the act of 1808 had put the community in his power, he began to advance, from exaction to exaction, until he now demands about twenty times the amount of his former charge, and threatens that he will rise still higher. From one of your memorialists Mr. Evans has demanded thirty-six hundred dollars for his license. This fact, while it shows how oppressively this patent bears upon individuals, will enable your honorable body to form some estimate of the enormous profits which the patentee will derive from a general use of his machinery throughout the United States.

Your memorialists will not consent to believe that Congress intended to let Mr. Evans loose upon the community with so grievous, so despotic a power; they, therefore, pray that your honorable body will again take this subject into consideration; that you may examine the grounds upon which Mr. Evans's patent issued, and do whatever in your wisdom you may think fit.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

WILLIAM COLE, and others.

MINISTERS AND CONSULS APPOINTED IN THE RECESS OF THE SENATE.

JAMES MADISON.

APRIL 9, 1814.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
April 8, 1814.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, of the 2d instant, I have the honor to transmit lists of the Ministers and Consuls of the United States who have been appointed, since the adoption of the Constitution, by the respective Presidents of the United States, in the recess of the Senate; distinguishing the cases in which the respective appointments had not been before filled from those which had been previously filled; and specifying, by the dates of the letters of recall, when the latter became vacant, in the case of Ministers.

To these lists are added copies of the commissions granted to Albert Gallatin, John Quincy Adams, and James A. Bayard, to negotiate and sign a Treaty of Commerce with Great Britain, and a Treaty of Commerce with Russia.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

Humiliation and Prayer.

HUMILIATION AND PRAYER.

It being a duty, peculiarly incumbent in a time of public calamity and war, humbly and devoutly to acknowledge our dependence upon Almighty God, and to implore His aid and protection; therefore,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a joint committee of both Houses wait on the President of the United States, and request that he recommend a day of Public Humiliation and Prayer, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity, and the offering of fervent supplications to Almighty God for the safety and welfare of these States, His blessing on their arms, and the speedy restoration of peace.

H. CLAY,

Speaker of House of Representatives.

E. GERRY,

Vice President, and President of Senate.

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1813.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by a joint resolution of the two Houses, have signified a request that a day may be recommended, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity, as a day of Public Humiliation and Prayer; and whereas, in times of public calamity, such as that of the war, brought on the United States by the injustice of a foreign Government, it is especially becoming that the hearts of all should be touched with the same, and the eyes of all be turned to that Almighty Power, in whose hands are the welfare and the destiny of nations: I do, therefore, issue this my Proclamation, recommending to all, who shall be piously disposed to unite their hearts and voices in addressing, at one and the same time, their vows and adorations to the great Parent and Sovereign of the Universe, that they assemble, on the second Thursday of September next, in their respective religious congregations, to render Him thanks for the many blessings He has bestowed on the people of the United States; that He has blessed them with a land capable of yielding all the necessities and requisites of human life, with ample means for convenient exchanges with foreign countries; that He has blessed the labors employed in its cultivation and improvement; that He is now blessing the exertions to extend and establish the arts and manufactures, which will secure within ourselves supplies too important to remain dependent on the precarious policy, on the peaceable dispositions of other nations; and, particularly, that He has blessed the United States with a political Constitution, founded on the will and authority of the whole people, and guaranteeing to each individual the security, not only of his person and his property, but of those sacred rights of conscience, so essential to his present happiness, and so dear to his future hopes. That with those expressions of devout thankfulness, be joined supplications to the same Almighty Power, that He would look down with compassion on our infirmities; that He would pardon our manifold transgressions, and awaken and strengthen us in all the wholesome purposes of repentance and amendment; that, in this season of trial and calamity, He would preside in a particular manner over our public councils, and inspire all citizens with a love of their country, and with those fraternal affections and that mutual confidence, which have so happy a tendency to make us safe at home and respected abroad; and that, as He was graciously pleased, heretofore, to smile on our struggles against the attempts of the Government of the empire, of which these States then made a part, to wrest from them the rights and privileges to which they were entitled in common with every other part, and to raise them to the station of an independent and sovereign people, so He would now be pleased, in like manner, to bestow His blessing on our arms in resisting the hostile and persevering efforts of the same Power to degrade us on the ocean, the common inheritance of all, from rights and immunities, belonging and essential to the American people, as a co-equal member of the great community of independent nations; and that, inspiring our enemies with moderation, with justice, and with that spirit of reasonable accommodation, which our country has continued to manifest, we may be enabled to beat our swords into ploughshares, and to enjoy in peace, every man, the fruits of his honest industry, and the rewards of his lawful enterprise.

If the public homage of a people can ever be worthy the favorable regard of the Holy and Omniscient Being to whom it is addressed, it must be that in which those who join in it are guided only by their free choice, by the impulse of their hearts and the dictates of their consciences; and such a spectacle must be interesting to all Christian nations; as proving that religion, that gift of Heaven for the good of man, freed from all coercive edicts, from that unhallowed connexion with the powers of this world, which corrupts religion into an instrument or an usurper of the policy of the State, and, making no appeal but to reason, to the heart, and to the conscience, can spread its benign influence everywhere, and can attract to the Divine Altar those free-will offerings of humble supplication, thanksgiving, and praise, which alone can be acceptable to Him whom no hypocrisy can deceive, and no forced sacrifices propitiate.

Upon these principles, and with these views, the good people of the United States are invited, in conformity with the resolution aforesaid, to dedicate the day above named to the religious solemnities therein recommended.

Given at Washington, this twenty-third day [L. s.] of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

An Act for the government of persons in certain fisheries.

Be it enacted, &c., That the master or skipper of any vessel of the burden of twenty tons or upwards, qualified according to law for carrying on the bank and other cod fisheries, bound from a port of the United States to be employed in any such fishery, at sea, shall, before proceeding on such fishing voyage, make an agreement in writing, or print, with every fisherman who may be employed therein, (except only an apprentice or servant of himself or owner,) and, in addition to such terms of shipment as may be agreed on, shall, in such agreement, express whether the same is to continue for one voyage or for the fishing season, and shall also express, that the fish or the proceeds of such fishing voyage or voyages, which may appertain to the fishermen, shall be divided among them in proportion to the quantities or number of said fish which they may respectively have caught; which agreement shall be endorsed or countersigned by the owner of such fishing vessel, or his agent. And if any fisherman, having engaged himself for a voyage or for the fishing season, in any fishing vessel, and signed an agreement therefor as aforesaid, shall thereafter, and while such agreement remains in force to be performed, desert or absent himself from such vessel without leave of the master or skipper thereof, or of the owner or his agent, such deserter shall be liable to the same penalties as deserting seamen or mariners are subject to in the merchant service, and may, in like manner and upon the like complaint and proof, be apprehended and detained; and all costs of process and commitment, if paid by the master or owner, shall be deducted out of the share of fish, or proceeds of any fishing voyage, to which such deserter had or shall become entitled. And upon such process for the value of a share or shares of the proceeds of fish delivered and sold as aforesaid, it shall be incumbent on the owner or his agent to procure a just account of the sales and division of such fish according to such agreement or contract; otherwise the said vessel shall be answerable upon such process for what may be the highest value of the shares demanded. But, in all cases, the owner of such vessel or his agent, appearing to answer to such process, may offer thereupon his account of general supplies made for such fishing voyage and of other supplies therefor made to either of the demandants, and shall be allowed to produce evidence thereof in answer to their demands, respectively; and judgment shall be rendered upon such process for the respective balances which, upon such an inquiry, shall appear: Provided, always, That, when process shall be issued against any vessel liable as aforesaid, if the owner thereof, or his agent, will give bond to each fisherman in whose favor such process shall be instituted, with sufficient security, to the satisfaction of two justices of the peace, one of whom shall be named by such owner or agent, and the other by the fisherman or fishermen pursuing such process, or if either party shall refuse, then the justice first appointed shall name his associate, with condition to answer and pay whatever sum shall be recovered by him or them on such process, there shall be an immediate discharge of such vessel: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent any fisherman from having his action at common law for his share or shares of fish, or the proceeds thereof, as aforesaid.

ceived unless the sum of five dollars be first paid into the hands of such agent or other person as the said commissioners may authorize to receive it. The times, places, and manner of receiving and entering subscriptions shall be prescribed by the said commissioners, and advertised in such gazettes as they may deem expedient; and whenever one hundred shares or more shall be subscribed, the commissioners, or a majority of them, shall give notice, in some newspaper printed in the said District, of a time and place, to be by them appointed, for the subscribers to proceed to organize the corporation by an election of officers; and all persons who may then be or thereafter may become the proprietors of shares in the said capital stock, either as subscribers for the same or as the legal representatives, successors, or assignees, of such subscribers, shall become one body politic and corporate, in deed, and in law, by the name and style of the "Alexandria and Leesburg Turnpike Company," and by the same name shall have perpetual succession and all the privileges belonging to a corporation; and shall be capable of taking and holding their said capital stock and the profits thereof, and of enlarging the same by new subscriptions if found necessary to fulfil the intent of this act; and of purchasing, taking, and holding, to them and their successors and assigns, in fee simple, or for any lesser estate, all such lands, tenements, and hereditaments and estate, real and personal, as shall be necessary and useful in the prosecution of their work; and of suing and being sued, of having a common seal, and of doing all and every other matter and thing, concerning the subject aforesaid, which a corporation or body politic may do.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall meet on the third Monday in March in every year, at such place as shall be fixed by their by-laws, for the purpose of choosing such officers as aforesaid for the ensuing year, in manner aforesaid, and at such other times as they shall be summoned by the president and directors aforesaid; at which annual or special meetings they shall have full power and authority to do and perform any act by law allowed and pertaining to the affairs of said company; and the president and directors for the time being shall hold their offices until others shall be appointed in their places. And the said corporation shall not be deemed to be dissolved by reason of any defect of officers, but if it should happen that there should be no president or directors competent to call a meeting of the stockholders, the same may be called by any stockholder for the purpose of electing such officers, giving thirty days' notice of the time and place of such meeting, by advertisements in a newspaper printed in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall procure printed certificates for all the shares of said stock, and shall deliver one such certificate, signed by the president, to each person for every share by him or her subscribed and held, which certificate shall be transferable at his or her pleasure, in person or by attorney, in the presence of the president, clerk, or treasurer of said company, who shall witness the same; subject, however, to all payment due or to grow due thereupon; and the assignee holding any such certificate, having caused the assignment to be entered in a book of the company to be kept for that purpose, shall be a member of said company; and for every certificate by him held shall be entitled to one share in the capital stock and estate of said company. And if any stockholder, after thirty days' public notice in a newspaper printed in the District of Columbia, of the time and place appointed for the payment of any portion or dividend of the sum subscribed in said stock, shall neglect to pay the same for the space of thirty days after the time so appointed, the share or shares on which such delinquency has taken place may be sold at public auction, and transferred by them to any person or persons willing to purchase for such price as can be obtained; or in case any proprietor shall fail to pay any instalment which shall be duly assessed, such instalment, or any part thereof, that shall remain deficient or unpaid, may be recovered of the person or persons so failing to pay, by warrant from a justice of the peace, if the amount shall not exceed twenty dollars; and if the sum so due shall exceed twenty dollars, the same may be recovered by motion, in the name of the said company, on ten days' notice, or by action at law in the usual course of judicial proceeding, in any court of record in the District of Columbia; and in all instances where the person so failing to pay his instalment cannot be found in the said district, then recovery shall be had against him by such mode of judicial proceeding as is authorized by the laws of the country where such defaulter shall be found; and in all such warrants, motions or actions, the certificate of the clerk, or recording officer of the said company, shall be conclusive evidence of the defendant's being a member of the company, and prima facie evidence of the amount due on the share or shares held by such defendant.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall meet at such times and places as shall be agreed upon for transacting their business; at which meeting any three members shall form a quorum, who, in the absence of the president, may choose a chairman, and shall keep minutes of all their transactions fairly entered in a book; and a quorum being met, they shall have full power and authority to appoint a treasurer and all other officers necessary and convenient, and agree with and appoint all such surveyors, intendants, artists, or other agents, as they shall judge necessary to carry on the intended works, and to fix their salaries, wages, or compensation; to direct and order the times, manner, and proportions, when and in which the stockholders shall pay moneys due on their respective shares; to draw orders on the treasurer for all moneys due from the said company, and, generally, to do and transact all such other matters, acts, and things, as by the by-laws, rules, and regulations of said company, shall be required or permitted.

Public Acts of Congress.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That upon application of the said president and directors of the said company, to the circuit court of the District of Columbia, or to the judges thereof out of court, the said court, or the judges, or any two of the judges thereof out of court, shall appoint three commissioners, not interested in any of the lands through which the said road may be laid out, nor interested in the stock of the company hereby created, nor in the stock of any other turnpike company, who shall each receive from the said president, directors, and company, two dollars for every day they shall respectively be actually necessarily employed in or about the affairs of the said company. And each of the said commissioners, before he proceeds to act as such, shall take and subscribe an oath, or solemn affirmation, in the presence of a justice of the peace, that he will well, faithfully and impartially, according to the best of his skill and judgment, and without unnecessary delay, execute and perform all the duties required of him as a commissioner under the sixth section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia;" which oaths or affirmations, so subscribed and certified by the justice, in whose presence they shall be severally taken and subscribed, shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the said circuit court, and enrolled among the land records of the county of Alexandria. And the said commissioners, or any two of them, being qualified as aforesaid, shall, upon the request of the said president and directors, cause to be surveyed, laid out, and ascertained, described, and marked, by certain metes and bounds, of the aforesaid turnpike road, described in the first section of this act, not less than sixty feet in breadth, in such routes, tracts or courses, for the same respectively, as, in the best of their judgment, will combine shortness of distance with the most convenient ground, and the smallest expense of money; and for this purpose it shall be lawful for them, and such agents, assistants, servants, or attendants, as they may think proper to employ, to enter upon any of the lands through or near which the said road may be laid out, having first given twenty days' public notice in some public newspaper, printed in the District of Columbia, of the time and place of their entering on the said business of surveying and laying out each road respectively. And if any proprietor of any part of the lands through which the said road may be laid out, shall require compensation for so much of his or her said land as may be occupied by the said road, or shall claim damages for or on account of the opening or laying out the said road through his or her land, and if the said president and directors cannot agree with such proprietors respecting the same, then the said commissioners, at the request of either party, shall appoint a day and place to hear and decide upon such claim, and the amount of compensation and damages which such proprietor shall be entitled to receive from the said president, directors and company therefor, first giving twenty days' notice to the adverse party, his or her agent, or attorney in fact, or other legal representative, if either shall be within the District of Columbia, and if the party so notified shall fail to attend, or if the party shall be an infant under age, non compos mentis, feme covert, or absent out of the District of Columbia, and have no known agent or legal representative therein, then the said commissioners may proceed ex parte to hear and decide the same; and the award of them, or any two of them, made in writing, signed by them or any two of them, shall by them be returned to the office of the clerk of the said court for the county of Alexandria, within ten days after such hearing, and a copy thereof shall, within ten days after such return, be served upon such of the parties as are resident in the District of Columbia; and if such award be not at the session of the said circuit court, in the county of Alexandria, next after such return of the said award to the clerk's office, be set aside on account of fraud or partiality in the said commissioners, or other cause deemed sufficient in the opinion of the court, the same shall be final and conclusive between the parties, and shall be recorded by the said clerk; and the sum so awarded being paid to the said clerk, for the use of the person entitled to receive the same, the said land, mentioned and described in the said award, shall and may be taken and occupied as a turnpike road and public highway forever. And the said commissioners, upon completing the said survey of the said road, shall return a plat and certificate of such survey to the said clerk, and the same being accepted by the said court, shall be recorded by the said clerk, and thereupon the road so laid out shall be taken, used and occupied as a turnpike road and public highway forever; and the said president, directors and company may thereupon proceed to enter upon the same, and shall cause at least twenty-four feet in breadth throughout the whole length thereof, to be made an artificial road of stone, gravel, or other hard substance, of sufficient depth or thickness to secure a solid and firm road, with a surface as smooth as the materials will admit, and so nearly level that it shall in no case rise or fall more than an angle of four degrees with a horizontal line, and the said road shall thereafter be kept in good and perfect repair; and wheresoever upon the said road any bridge shall be deemed necessary, the same shall be built of sound and suitable materials. And in case either of the said commissioners should die, or refuse to act, or become incapacitated, or should be removed by the court for misconduct, the said court may appoint another in his place; and when, in the opinion of the said president and directors, the said road shall be completed to the extent of twenty-four feet in breadth, the same shall be examined by the said commissioners, or any two of them; and if in the opinion of them, or any two of them, the said road should have been completed to the extent of at least twenty four feet in breadth, according to the meaning of this act, they shall certify the same, to the said circuit court, or the judges thereof out of court, and their certificate being accepted by the said court, or any two judges thereof, and

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That upon application of the said president and directors of the said company to the circuit court of the District of Columbia, or to the judges of said court, out of court, the said court or the judges, or any two of the judges thereof out of court, shall appoint three commissioners, not interested in any of the lands through which the said road may be laid out, nor interested in the stock of the company hereby created, nor in the occupancy of any mills or water works by which the said road may pass, who shall receive, each, from the said president and directors and company, two dollars for every day they shall respectively be actually necessarily employed in or about the affairs of said company; and each of the said commissioners, before he proceeds to act as such, shall take and subscribe an oath or solemn affirmation in the presence of a justice of the peace, that he will well, faithfully and impartially, according to the best of his skill and judgment, and without unnecessary delay, execute and perform all the duties required of him as a commissioner, under the sixth section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia;" which oaths or affirmations, so subscribed and certified by the justice in whose presence they shall be severally taken and subscribed, shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the said circuit court, and enrolled among the land records of the county of Washington; and the said commissioners, or any two of them, being qualified as aforesaid, shall, upon the request of the said president and directors, cause to be surveyed, laid out, and ascertained, described and marked, by certain metes and bounds of the aforesaid turnpike road, described in the first section of this act, not less than sixty feet in breadth in such routes, tracts or courses for the same respectively, as in the best of their judgment will combine

And the said commissioners, upon completing the said survey of the said road, shall return a plat and certificate of such survey to the said clerk, and the same being accepted by the said court shall be recorded by the said clerk, and thereupon the road so laid out shall be taken, used, and occupied, as a turnpike road and public highway forever; and the said president, directors, and company, may thereupon proceed to enter upon the same, and shall cause at least

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel of twenty tons or upwards, employed as aforesaid, shall be entitled to the allowance granted by this act, unless the skipper or master thereof shall, before he proceeds on any fishing voyage, make an agreement in writing, or in print, with every fisherman employed therein according to the provisions of the act, entitled "An act for the government of persons in certain fisheries."

of this act, contravene or infringe any of the provisions thereof: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to the owner or owners of any ship or vessel who shall have made a bona fide sale of such ship or vessel, in any port or harbor of the United States, before notice of this act at such port or harbor respectively, nor to the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, in any foreign port or place, who shall have made a bona fide sale thereof before notice of this act: And provided also, That such bond shall not release the owners and master of such ship or vessel, or any other person, from the obligation of giving every other bond required by this act.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners of all vessels licensed for fisheries, or those bound on a whaling voyage, and having no other cargo than necessary sea stores, salt, and the usual fishing tackling and apparel, shall give a general bond in four times the value of the vessel and cargo that they will not, during the continuance of this act, proceed to any foreign port or place, and will return with their fishing fare to some port or place within the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel shall, during the continuance of this act, depart from any port of the United States without a clearance or permit, or if any ship or vessel shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, proceed to a foreign port or place, or trade with, or put on board of, any other ship or vessel any article or articles prohibited by this act, such ship or vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, produce, provisions, naval or military stores, shall be wholly forfeited; and if the same shall not be seized, the owner or owners, agent, freighter, or factors of any such ship or vessel shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay a sum equal to double the value of the ship or vessel and cargo, and shall never thereafter be allowed a credit for duties on any goods, wares, and merchandise, imported by him or them into any of the ports of the United States; and the master or commander of such ship or vessel, as well as all other persons who shall knowingly be concerned in any such violations of this act, shall each, respectively, forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding twenty thousand dollars for every such offence, whether the vessel be seized and condemned or not, and shall be imprisoned for a term not less than six calendar months, nor exceeding one year; and the oath or affirmation of any master or commander knowingly offending against the provisions of this section, shall ever thereafter be inadmissible before any collector of the customs of the United States.
